About the Contributors

Cheyenne Bennett is a cultural anthropologist for New South Associates, Inc. She received her BA in Anthropology from Mississippi State University and her MA in Anthropology from the University of Mississippi. Her research interests focus on the anthropology of space and place, political ecology, and the effects of development induced displacement and resettlement in the southeast U.S.

Maximilian Conrad is an M.A. student in Anthropology and Southern Studies at the University of Mississippi. His research focuses on a population of American Confederate descendants in southeastern Brazil. He received a B.A. in Anthropology and Politics in 2019 from Saint Mary's College of California.

Matt McDermott is an M.A. student in Anthropology at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte. While at his undergraduate institution, UNC Asheville (UNCA), McDermott conducted over a year of research into the Wiccan religion, exploring the different ways that it embraces individualism in their beliefs and practices. This research helped him to win several awards including the Southern Anthropological Society's undergraduate student paper competition as well as others within UNCA's anthropology Department.

Kiley E. Molinari is an Assistant Professor of Anthropology at Francis Marion University. Receiving her PhD in Sociocultural Anthropology from the University of Oklahoma, Molinari has focused her research on topics such as material culture studies, Indigenous new media, language and cultural revitalization and retention, digital cultural heritage, and collaborative research within Indigenous communities.
