Swinburne's "The Tale of Balen": an Edition with Critical Commentary

Warren Hill Kelly
University of Mississippi, warrenkelly21@hotmail.com

Follow this and additional works at: https://egrove.olemiss.edu/etd
Part of the English Language and Literature Commons

Recommended Citation
https://egrove.olemiss.edu/etd/1396

This Dissertation is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at eGrove. It has been accepted for inclusion in Electronic Theses and Dissertations by an authorized administrator of eGrove. For more information, please contact egrove@olemiss.edu.
SWINBURNE’S THE TALE OF BALEN: AN EDITION WITH CRITICAL COMMENTARY

A Dissertation

Presented for the Doctor of Philosophy

Degree

The University of Mississippi

Warren Hill Kelly

June 2011
ABSTRACT

Warren Hill Kelly’s Swinburne’s The Tale of Balen: an Edition with Critical Commentary comprises a variorum-like edition of the poem that records all variances of the poem evident in its manuscript through its first and second editions, Chatto & Windus 1896 and 1904, or those editions produced during the poet’s lifetime and therefore potentially bearing evidence of his editorial input. The edition forms as its basis the poet’s final intention expressed in the manuscript, and notes all alterations within the manuscript and the first two published editions, and by coupling the edition’s text with the notations pertaining to the manuscript, readers have access to, in effect, a transcription of the poem’s manuscript.

The edition also contains an introduction that accounts for the poem’s antecedents, that is, the poet’s life and influences as well as the history of the Balen myth, and that traces the poem’s critical reception since its publication into the present. The introduction contains also a brief user’s guide and some observations regarding Swinburne’s manuscript practices.
DEDICATION

In Memoriam
David Carroll Kelly
(1942-2002)
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I would like to acknowledge and thank some individuals, who assisted me either in their capacity as agents of an institution or on a personal basis. In the former category, I am grateful to the people of The British Museum and Library, who have kindly granted me permission to use and reproduce Swinburne’s manuscript of The Tale of Balen, which resides in The British Museum as Ashley 4409. Additionally, I am thankful to the library staff of the academic libraries where I conducted research, including the university libraries at The University of Mississippi, Cornell University, and Florida Atlantic University.

I owe a profound debt of gratitude to the members of my doctoral and dissertation committee at the University of Mississippi—Professors Benjamin F. Fisher, Colby H. Kullman, T. J. Ray, and John R. Neff—and a couple of professors who served on the committee, but because of scheduling conflicts were unable to see this project and degree to its completion—Professors Ronald A. Schroeder and John Cloy. Special thanks is due to Professor Ben Fisher, who has directed my work and who suggested that I construct a variorum-type edition of The Tale of Balen—a project he had first planned to undertake—as my dissertation.

I am certain also that I would not have been able to complete the present project without the help of many family members and friends. I offer great thanks to my father, William G. Kelly, Jr., who has strongly encouraged and has financed this and all of my educational pursuits, and likewise, I would like to thank my mother, Sue E. Lesikar, and stepfather, the late Johnny N.
Lesikar. Much thanks is due also to too many members of my extended family to name here, and to many friends, especially Brian A. Nagel, who has been an on-going source of encouragement and technical support.

To these people and many other people whom I have no doubt neglected to acknowledge, I would like to express thanks.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>SECTION</th>
<th>PAGE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Swinburne’s Biography</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sources and Analogues to The Tale of Balen</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Survey of the Poem’s Critical Reception</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Editorial Observations from Transcribing the Manuscript and Collating Editions</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Guide to Using the Edition</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Edition Proper</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bibliography</td>
<td>298</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vita</td>
<td>304</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
INTRODUCTION

Taken together, the present edition of The Tale of Balen and this introduction are designed to provide a reader with a view of the poem’s influences and evolution and an account of its changing interpretations over time. To those ends, the poem’s text comprises, in a variorum-like format, a record of alterations to the poem from its manuscript through its first two published editions, or those produced during the poet’s lifetime. I also survey in my introduction Swinburne’s biography with special reference to its bearing on the poem, the poem’s antecedents and analogues, and an overview of the poem’s critical reception.

Swinburne’s Biography

In London on April 5, 1837, Algernon Charles Swinburne was born into an aristocratic family, of which he was the eldest of six children. The household resided mainly at the family seat on the Isle of Wight, but periodically visited another family house in Northumberland, locations that fostered the poet’s devotion to the natural landscape and the sea. These affections appear in The Tale of Balen in the poet’s numerous natural descriptions, especially at the beginning of each of the poem’s fyttes.

Swinburne’s education, of course, pervades The Tale of Balen, and all of his other works, in inestimable ways. This cultivation began at home, where his mother, Lady Jane, acquainted the young Swinburne with an array of art and literature, including the Bible, Shakespeare’s plays, Sir Walter Scott’s Waverly novels, those of Dickens, and the writings of Dante. Additionally she initiated his study of French and Italian at home. His learning of those modern languages continued as he entered Eton College in April of 1849, and in his four years there he studied also classical Greek and Latin poetry and expanded his knowledge of English literature, notably Elizabethan drama. Despite Swinburne’s success at Eton, unclear circumstances led to his finishing his preparation for university, under a tutor at his family’s home. During this time the young Swinburne aspired to join the army, which his father, Admiral Charles Henry Swinburne forbade, likely because of his son’s frailty. Instead, Swinburne attended Balliol College, Oxford University, where his family anticipated his undertaking a degree in preparation for a legal or ecclesiastical career.

At Oxford Swinburne encountered some influences that left indelible marks on his poetry and other writings. One was John Nichol, a leader within Old Mortality, a group of student intellectuals, to which Swinburne belonged. Pulled by Nichol’s sway, Swinburne resigned his religious faith and adopted a belief in political republicanism, which would form the ideological foundation of some future national poetry, poems that also bear the influence of Percy Bysshe Shelley. A second influence at Oxford was the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, particularly the members Dante Gabriel Rossetti, William Morris, and Edward Burne-Jones. This movement’s interest in medievalism, no doubt, sowed the seeds that bloomed years later as The Tale of Balen, and the poet’s other medieval poems. Initially, William Morris’s poem “The Defence of Guenevere” inspired imitation in Swinburne that manifested as his poem Queen Yseult. Although Swinburne’s poetry and writing evolved at Oxford, his extracurricular commitments and idiosyncratic habits led to his leaving the university in 1860 without taking a degree.

In 1861 Swinburne took up residence in London and affirmed his intention to have a literary career, a choice his father begrudgingly consented to, and the poet’s living came originally from an allowance his father bestowed. In the city Swinburne reestablished his association with the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, which, with other associations, contributed to his cultivating a bohemian lifestyle, replete with alcoholism. Also, in 1862, the poet’s brief love affair with Jane Faulkner regrettably dissolved. Despite these difficulties, Swinburne continued writing critical reviews and poetry, but popularity evaded him, that is, until the publication (at his father’s expense) of Atalanta in Calydon, which received fervent praise and established the poet’s reputation. This critical favor was relatively short-lived, because Swinburne’s 1866 Poems and Ballads was denounced as unethical. Distressed by the criticism, Swinburne’s drinking was exacerbated, and he had a scandalous tryst, which further deteriorated his social reputation.

These problems ultimately gave rise to another phase in Swinburne’s poetic output, the artistic stage to which The Tale of Balen might be assigned. The period bears characteristics following from the poet’s renewed interest in social, political, and religious themes, whose presence in The Tale of Balen should not be dismissed. Swinburne’s adoption of these concerns might have been prompted by his meeting in 1867 the Italian freedom-fighter Giuseppe Mazzini, whom the poet had idealized since his days at Oxford. The first important poetic products of this period were respectively Songs Before Sunrise and Poems and Ballads, Second Series, but the 1870’s and afterward witnessed also the poet’s publication of dramas and criticism, some of the latter vitriolic.

After Swinburne’s father died in 1877, the poet’s health deteriorated markedly because of severe alcoholism, and he came near death, until his friend Theodore Watts-Dunton invited Swinburne to reside at his home, The Pines, in Putney, an arrangement that lasted about thirty years and the remainder of the poet’s life. These years at The Pines saw Swinburne’s publication of many articles for periodicals; his two great Arthurian poems, Tristram of Lyonesse and Other Poems, in 1882, and The Tale of Balen, in 1896; and a number of political-minded poems, which ironically disfavored Gladstone and Parnell (despite the poet’s advocacy for Italian republicanism). Swinburne died at The Pines on April 10, 1909, and was buried in the Bonchurch Churchyard on the Isle of Wight.
Sources and Analogues to The Tale of Balen

The undisputed authority on Swinburne’s appropriation of sources in The Tale of Balen, and in all of his medieval poems, for that matter, is David Staines, who published his article “Swinburne’s Arthurian World: Swinburne’s Arthurian Poetry and Its Medieval Sources” in Studia Neophilologica in 1978. Bestowed with this resource, I shall treat this matter by giving an account of Staines’s findings.

Staines initiates his discussion by remarking that, as Swinburne read Malory’s Balin, or the Knight of the Two Swords, it would have appealed to the poet on four counts. Scholars often cite three: Swinburne’s and Balen’s common Northumbrian origin, Tennyson’s prior adulteration of Malory’s tale, and the story’s capacity for probing fate’s role in human lives; the fourth, interestingly, rests in William Morris’s one-time intention to adapt the same story to poetry. Staines muses, “It is curious that the two stories Morris was considering were the stories which form the basis of Swinburne’s two major Arthurian poems” (64).

While Morris’s selection of worthwhile Arthurian enterprises might have spurred Swinburne to write about Balen, and Tristram as well, the poet adhered faithfully to Malory’s text in writing The Tale of Balen, and admittedly so, as Swinburne divulges in a letter to Mary Louisa Molesworth, dated May 11, 1896: “The groundwork is an old tale of chivalry which I have closely followed in all its incidents, with but few additions or variations: so it is only for the treatment of it that any credit—or discredit—is due to me” (Staines 65). Swinburne’s adherence to Malory as a source for The Tale of Balen manifests, according to Staines, as the poet’s paraphrasing, sense-for-sense, if not word-for-word, the account within Morte D’Arthur. Such constraint appears in Tennyson only within his earliest idyll, that entitled Morte D’Arthur, and the poet laureate’s variance thereafter seems to have incited Swinburne to restore for Victorian readership the story of Balen to Malory’s design.

The first of The Tale of Balen’s seven cantos, or fyttes, constitutes the most original, Staines contends, because it holds several variances from Malory. Whereas he presents the damsel bound to the sword before introducing readers to Balen, Swinburne shows them first Balen in his native Northumberland and portrays the title character’s arrival at Arthur’s court, and only afterward relates the episode involving the damsel. Prior to her introduction, moreover, Swinburne inserts a motive for Balen’s murder of a knight and his subsequent imprisonment: Balen reacts because the man disparaged the character of Northumberlanders. Malory mentions only that Balen was incarcerated for slaying one of Arthur’s knights. With these additions, Swinburne makes his most significant alterations to Malory’s rendering of the tale. In fact, Staines alerts his readers to Swinburne’s loyalty, from the second fytte onward, to Malory’s account of Balen’s story:

From the beginning of the second canto until the conclusion of the poem, Swinburne observes such close adherence to Malory that almost every stanza of the poem has a direct correspondence in Malory’s text. Every character in Malory is introduced into Swinburne’s poem in the same context and with the same relative importance. No incident in Malory has been omitted by Swinburne. In addition, his attempt to recapture the medieval atmosphere of the story prompts the poet to employ a large degree of close verbal fidelity. The poem becomes an exact retelling of Malory with appropriate descriptive embellishments to paint the setting more vividly or to emphasize the intensity of the actions of the characters. (Staines 65-66)

Although after his first canto Swinburne varies his narrative little from Malory’s, minor textual variations do appear, and Staines notes them in his article. For example, Swinburne expounds on the knights who lack the qualities needed to free the damsel from the sword, and also in this episode, the poet disrupts Malory’s chronology of contesting knights by incorporating Launcelot, Guenevere, Tristram, and Iseult into the spectacle. Notable deviations do not appear again until Balen’s combat with Lot: at the latter’s burial, Swinburne includes not only Morguase and her four sons, as Malory does, but also Mordred, whose attendance prefigures a disastrous destiny for Arthur’s court and perhaps for Balen as well. While Swinburne presents the episodes involving Garlon and Pellam with relative fidelity to Malory’s version of events, Staines mentions that Tennyson adapts these scenes unreservedly. Swinburne’s only significant alteration to these accounts appears as his enhancement in detailing of Pellam’s chapel.

In conclusion, Staines finds that Swinburne’s The Tale of Balen forms “a close paraphrase” to Malory’s account of Balen. Swinburne’s only omissions comprise Malory’s foreshadowing of eminent occurrences in Morte D’Arthur, exclusions entirely fitting Swinburne’s limited focus; they include allusions to Galahad and his search for the Grail, Lancelot and his immorality, and the demise of the Round Table. The poet’s primary generalized additions come in the form of natural and seasonal descriptions, as well as well-integrated insinuations of the power of fate in Balen’s life, which serve to make him seem the sufferer of destiny, rather than of his own rashness.

Staines does not trace the genealogy of the Balen story earlier than Malory’s Morte D’Arthur to its sources in the thirteenth century Old French Post-Vulgate Cycle, but this lapse may be appropriate because Swinburne dealt solely with Malory, or so all available evidence indicates. Looking for sources written prior to Morte D’Arthur befits a study of Malory’s work itself, not its descendents. And while no text is derived from Swinburne’s Tale of Balen, an analogous text exists in Tennyson’s “Balin and Balan” from Idylls of the King. A reader might even be tempted to treat it as a secondary source to The Tale of Balen because Tennyson’s idyll predates Swinburne’s tale by ten years and because Swinburne’s reaction to the prior work constitutes a motivation for his own composition. The two works bear so many dissimilarities, though, that only their classification as analogous texts is sustainable.

So that readers may recognize the degree of difference between The Tale of Balen and Tennyson’s “Balin and Balan,” I shall render a summary of the latter here. The idyll begins as Arthur commands an old knight to visit and solicit payment from Pellam, who has refused to send the king tribute. Perhaps fearing for his life, the aged treasurer tells King Arthur that two unknown knights abide outside Camelot, near a fountain, two who accost, dual, and defeat any passer-by knight; and so mercifully, Arthur instructs his old servant to travel another route. Then, the king conceals himself and engages these knights, who reveal their mission as dishonoring all of the Round Table knights, and after assenting to their challenge, Arthur readily defeats both men.

At a later time, one of Arthur’s heralds invites the two knights to court, and there, King Arthur asks them to identify themselves. Balin responds and says that they are brothers; he is called Balin the Savage, and his brother, Balan. Relating his story, Balin reveals that, three years prior and in a rage, he struck one of Arthur’s thralls, a crime for which Balin was exiled. Prone to such episodes of madness, Balin says that the condition worsened during his exile, and only the support his brother, Balan, has kept him in check. Moreover, he discloses that the exile inspired such bitterness in him that he has aspired to defeat many of Arthur’s knights so that he may convince the king that he is a great knight, worthy of readmission to the Round Table. In this endeavor, he had been undefeated until recently, he confesses, when an unnamed knight unseated him from his horse. This moment of complete honesty, rather than all of his fighting, somewhat ironically, proves the action that prompts Arthur to readmit Balin to the court.

Days later, the ambassador who was sent to Pellam reappears and proclaims that King Pellam, formally irreligious and troublesome to Arthur, has recently converted to Christianity, and now traces his descent from Joseph of Arimathea, performs various religious rites, and claims to possess the sword the Romans used to pierce Christ’s side. In fact, Pellam currently holds so little interest in earthly affairs that he has entrusted his kingdom to Garlon, his heir apparent. The latter paid the sought tribute, if grudgingly. The envoy also reports that, returning to Arthur’s court, he found a murdered knight and first assumed that Garlon had committed the offense, but later learned that an evil forest demon had actually killed the man. After hearing this news, Arthur calls for a volunteer knight to pursue the murderer, and wishing to prove himself, Balan accepts the quest, but prior to his setting out, he instructs his brother, Balin, to temper his moods.

While his brother is away, Balin vows to enhance his chivalric qualities, and to this end, he emulates Lancelot, the most celebrated knight at Camelot, and he idealizes Guinevere, whom he regards as a paragon of female perfection. In these endeavors, Balin succeeds—until he witnesses a clandestine meeting between Lancelot and Guinevere, a violation that undermines his new-found faith in gentility. The shock causes Balin to lapse into his former insanity, and in rage, he leaves Arthur’s castle for the forest, in the direction his brother traveled. Balin, too, wishes now to locate the demon because he hopes that he may unleash his rage on the evil creature and thereby relieve himself of his madness. Traveling recklessly, Balin does encounter the demon, who attacks him and defeats him, because of the knight’s distraught state. Without his lance and sword, Balin walks to Pellam’s castle.

There, Garlon shows great hospitality toward Balin, but their rapport wanes after Balin praises Queen Guinevere and then Garlon counters by slandering her. Upset, Balin controls himself and refutes the rumors. The next day, however, Garlon continues to disparage
Guinevere, and Balin loses his composure and assails Garlon, who is rescued by his men.
Shattering his sword, Balin retreats to the castle’s chapel, where he takes the sacred lance, with which he fights his way outside. He escapes his pursuers and finds his horse, but feeling he had discredited Guinevere, whose emblem adorned his shield, he discards it.

Fatigued by his rage and his futile efforts to restrain it, Balin falls asleep in the woods.
As Balin slumbers, Vivien and her squire, enemies of Arthur, discover him, and after Balin awakens, Vivien requests that he escort her to Arthur’s court. Balin declines, protesting that he unworthy to attend the royal household and vowing that he will inhabit the woods for the remainder of his life, as suits a savage. At this self-debasement, Vivien laughs at him and causes Balin to believe that she taunts him; however, she explains that she found irony in his attitude, because of the hypocrisy and corruption already present at Camelot. She bolsters her allegations with malicious lies and misrepresentations, and unable to bear them, Balin flees into the forest’s depths.

There, still seeking the wood-demon, Balan hears his brother’s cries of madness, and he mistakes them for the demon’s screams. Hurrying to find and fight the fiend, Balan takes his squire’s shield, instead of his own. When the brothers meet, they are unable to recognize each other, and they fight fiercely. Each brother mortally wounds the other, and only as they lie dying do they discover each other’s identity and recognize the tragedy of their outcome.

Although Tennyson’s idyll and Swinburne’s tale share common features, they present different narratives—the latter demonstrating strong adherence to Malory, the former strong poetic license. Remarkably, no other canonical writer in the English language has treated the dynamic story of Balin since these two Victorian poets did. Otherwise, T. H. White employs the names Balin and Balan for two hawks whom Arthur meets in The Sword and the Stone, and in 1977, the popular fantasy writer Douglas Carmichael adapted the Balin story in his novel Pendragon.
A Survey of the Poem’s Critical Reception

In the following paragraphs, I catalogue chronologically and summarize accordingly the corpus of criticism on Swinburne’s The Tale of Balen.

The earliest lengthy study appears in 1925 in the quarterly Neophilologus, where Willem Van Doorn publishes in four installments and in six sections “An Enquiry into the Causes of Swinburne’s Failure as a Narrative Poet. With Special Reference to the ‘The Tale of Balen’.” Van Doorn discloses outright his negative disposition toward the poem in his essay’s title. In its first section, he begins by lamenting readers and critics’ tendency to canonize the marginal works of otherwise outstanding poets. With his unfavorable attitude toward the poem and toward its approving readers established, the critic renders a litany of the poem’s detractors, whom Van Doorn congratulates, and of its advocates, whom he discredits. Although the merits and demerits of the poem’s critics, as Van Doorn issues them, invite debate, a scholar wishing to inventory the earliest critical remarks on the poem, however brief, would likely find this portion of the essay useful.

In the article’s second section, Van Doorn questions the sincerity of Swinburne’s republicanism, which the poet espoused under the influence of Giuseppe Mazzini and Victor Hugo, and the critic alleges that the poet’s works’ lack of censure against the English monarchy and government evinces the poet’s failed conviction. Regardless of whether Swinburne’s later poetry, including The Tale of Balen, accomplishes a political goal, Van Doorn’s apparent expectation that Swinburne would, in those works, compose didactic verse may suggest that Balen merits examination for a subtext, perhaps a social or political analogue contemporary to the poem’s composition.
After impugning Swinburne’s politics, Van Doorn challenges the poet’s avowed artistic method and its realization in his work. From Swinburne’s critiques of his own work and others’, Van Doorn deduces that the poet’s aesthetic code is the following: “what is wanted is a thoughtful, not a sentimental poem, in which there is a maximum of effect achieved by the expense of a minimum of apparent effort” (41). Armed with this metric, the critic measures one of Swinburne’s purportedly greatest poems, “Hertha,” as deficient according to his own criteria. The defect here appears in the poem’s seeming lack of concision. Arguing that, if such faults blemish Swinburne’s best output, then they likely pervade his whole poetic corpus, Van Doorn casts doubt on whether the poet’s aesthetic convictions are real.

In the essay’s third section, Van Doorn turns his attention to the shortcomings he perceives in Swinburne’s poetic sound, his verse’s music. The critic begins this enterprise by citing Gunnar Serner’s 1910 dissertation On the Language of Swinburne’s Lyrics and Epics, where Serner endorses the poet’s verbal music and goes so far as to call him “the Paganini of lyrical poetry” (120). Resorting to ad hominem attack, Van Doorn repudiates Serner’s commendation of Swinburne by alleging that Serner evidently has a poor ear for poetry based on his dissertation’s “uncouth sentences” (121). The critic’s proclivity to slander continues as he counters Swinburne’s musicality by asserting that his reading of Latin and French were flawed. From these unsubstantial attacks, Van Doorn turns to an actual examination of the Swinburne’s verse, which the critic deprecates because it is “full of awkward vowel-combinations or cacophonous repetitions of the same sounds” (123). Nonetheless, Van Doorn acknowledges that a number of credible scholars and critics have favorably reviewed Swinburne’s poetic music—J. W. Mackail, Edmund Gosse, and Professor Saintsbury—but this seeming mitigation of or counterbalance to the critic’s disapproval soon gives way to his attenuation of those men’s endorsements, especially Saintsbury’s. Van Doorn asserts that a scrutiny of Saintsbury’s review’s wording reveals that Swinburne’s poems “are not at all concerned with melodiousness properly so called, but exclusively with metrical effects” (124). The poetic outcome, according to Van Doorn, is: “The tumultuous rush of Swinburne’s verse carries reader or hearer along; the strong rhythmical beats have the effect of drumming and rattling instruments of percussion. They intoxicate, and put intellect and senses asleep, as tomtoms and gongs stir up savages and barbarians to all-oblivious frenzy” (125). Any occurrence of music or melody within these hypnotic rhythms constitute, for the critic, a “by-product” or an accident.

In the essay’s fourth section, Van Doorn addresses The Tale of Balen proper, and despite his bias against the poem, he presents neutrally a wealth of information about it. After alleging that the story of Balin is “one of the least interesting of the whole Morte Darthur” and assessing Malory’s (and by extension Swinburne’s) narration of it as “a failure and a chaotic jumble,” Van Doorn outlines the poem’s storyline with perhaps the most detailed synopsis available in English (199). He divides the story into fourteen sections, each of which he carefully summarizes. His headings for the fourteen episodes follow: the Episode of the Damsel with the Sword; the Episode of the Lady of the Lake; the Episode of Launceor; the Episode of the Defeat and Capture of Ryence; the Episode of the Battle; the Episode of the Sorrowful Knight; the Episode of Perin de Mountbelyard; the Episode of the Sick Chatelaine; the Episode of the Knight with the wounded son; the Episode of Garlon and Pellam; the Episode of Garnish of the Mount; the Episode of the Castle; the Episode of the Combat, the Mutual Recognition of the Combatants, and their Deaths; and the End (201-202).
Having sectioned and recapitulated the story, Van Doorn then ponders ways of understanding the text, most of which involve, directly or indirectly, possible sources or analogues. Initially, though, he dismisses some theories that had been already asserted regarding the Balin myth and its manifestations, by the date of his article. One approach addresses the brothers’ Catholicism, evident in their acquisition of extreme unction and the story’s inclusion of Joseph of Arimathya; however, Van Doorn rejects this basis for interpretation because the story contains little other reference to Christianity. Then, the critic considers the relevance of the solar myth theory—which, because of work in anthropology, was a favorite critical bent of the nineteenth century and was applied to the Siegfried myth. Whereas, in the Siegfried story, the characters recognize and fight each other as incarnations of darkness and light, Balen and Balan do not recognize and kill each other by mistake. Accordingly, Van Doorn finds the solar theory ill-suited to study of the Balin myth and its descendants. The same conclusion emerges from a consideration of the Balin myth’s relevance to the story of Belinus and Brennius found in Godfrey of Monmouth’s Historia Regum Britanniae. Here, Van Doorn observes that the only relation between the texts appears in Godfrey’s reference to Northumbria, but Belinus and Brennius are not of Northumbrian descent as Balen and Balan are. Moreover, the former pair of brothers bear the title of prince, while the latter certainly do not.

The aforementioned attempts at cross-referencing lead Van Doorn to list motifs common between Malory’s story of Balin and other “sagas, tales, or epics” (203). Even though the critic does little more than offer up this listing of tropes, it reminds readers that the versions of the Balin story contain moments reminiscent of others in classical, medieval, and neo-medieval literature. For this reason, I reproduce Van Doorn’s inventory in his own language: 1. the freeing of a sword; 2. the head of the hero asked as a boon, which boon has been inadvertently granted beforehand; 3. the invisible slayer; 4. blood as medicine; 5. a kingdom suffering because its ruler has been grievously wounded; 6. a false lady discovered sleeping with a paramour of repellent aspect; and 7. ‘the custom of the castle,’ the victor succeeding to the position the man he has slain, with the inevitable prospect of being killed in like fashion himself (203).

Transitioning into an attack on Malory’s story-telling technique, which Swinburne relies upon considerably in The Tale of Balen, Van Doorn judges his motif-index as “the chief ingredients of Malory’s ill-constructed and badly told story” (204). The critic then references Vida Scudder’s 1917 Le Morte Darthur of Sir Thomas Malory & its Sources in order to allege that Malory’s psychological, not pictorial, retelling of his sources—Chretien, Wolfram, and Gottfried—lacks innovation and that the chronicler condenses the narratives in his haste to finish his enterprise. Proof of an appropriation of Balin source material superior to Malory’s exists, according to Van Doorn, in the 1535 Spanish El Baladro del Sabio Merlin, a work analogous to Malory’s, but not indebted to it. Additionally, Van Doorn observes that Tennyson’s construction of a hero in his retelling of the Balin myth resembles that in the Spanish Baladro, who operates according to a more probably motivation than that of Malory’s, and by extension Swinburne’s, Balin-figure. To demonstrate the alleged superiority of Baladro’s presentation of events, the critic systematically and extensively differentiates between the dissimilar moments in the Baladro’s and Malory’s account of the Balin story, and then presumes the Baladro’s advantage.
Moreover, this Spanish text displays, according to Van Doorn, only one significant anomaly, an interpolation to an unnamed (perhaps theorized) original text: Merlin’s identification of the damsel of the sword as a sorceress and traitor who desires retribution on her brother, because he killed her lover. Otherwise, as Van Doorn says, “artistically, both as regards psychology and picturesqueness, [the Baladro] is far superior to Malory’s version, which because of its baldness and exaggerated conciseness, presents a more disconnected appearance than the original can have done” (213).

In his essay’s fifth section, Van Doorn undertakes the question of what incited Swinburne to adopt the Balin story, or as the critic says, “this unpromising material” (273), as a poetic subject, and immediately, he asserts two catalysts—a feeling of rivalry and a sense of local patriotism—on both of which he expounds at length. Actually, the contest between Swinburne and Tennyson, as Van Doorn explains it, is reduced to a difference of approach when handling medieval material, rather than a rivalry. In his last idyll from Idylls of the King, “Balin and Balan,” Tennyson liberally adapts Malory’s source story, whereas Swinburne, in The Tale of Balen, reproduces it relatively faithfully. This difference does not stem, however, from Swinburne’s general practice of treating sources as immutable—a point the critic evinces by citing the poet’s departures from the Atalanta myth. Rather, Van Doorn attributes Swinburne’s adherence to the medieval source, to the influence of William Morris’s strong reverence for the Middle Ages. Morris admired medieval stories because they (and their inherent worldview) differ from Victorian creations, and so, not surprisingly, Swinburne, Dante Rossetti, and Morris’s other followers opposed Tennyson’s modernizing transformations of medieval material, and moreover, in their own appropriations, maintain the source’s design as much as possible.

In Van Doorn’s scheme to locate Swinburne’s motivations in composing The Tale of Balen, the critic turns next to a feeling he calls “local patriotism.” For Swinburne, this allegiance aligned with Northumberland, and while no one disputes the poet’s self-professed association with that place, Van Doorn finds the connection more self-elected than genuine. Be that as it may, Swinburne deemed any aspersion on Northumberland and its people as a personal affront, and he suffered such an injury when Tennyson deprecates the Northumberland character by attributing Balin’s violent nature to the same. Consequently, Swinburne issues a rebuttal against Tennyson’s libel of medieval Northumberland, in the form of his The Tale of Balen.

Swinburne’s treatment of the twin brothers from the borderland does not emanate, however, from a penetration of the medieval spirit, as readers find in Morris’s work, but rather, according to Van Doorn, from Swinburne’s uninspired imitation of Malory’s account. Despite Swinburne’s alleged simulation of the Balin story as it appears in Morte D’Arthur, Van Doorn discerns two instances where Swinburne adds to all of Malory’s “absurdities and incongruities” (275). The first appears in the poem’s fourth section’s fourth stanza, within the “Launceor-Szene,” as “Launceor’s continual bawling” (275), and the second occurs in the fourth section’s stanzas twelve through twenty, in the same scene, as an episode Van Doorn identifies as “utter nonsense,” without explaining the basis of his judgment.

Before closing the essay’s fifth section, Van Doorn rejects various positive reviews and endorsements The Tale of Balen received. In the Academy, a reviewer praises Malory’s storytelling ability and then asserts that Swinburne’s even transcends Malory’s—a claim Van Doorn opposes by professing that Malory lacked narrative skill and that Swinburne blundered in emulating Malory and accordingly produced a worse version of the Balin story. A writer in the Saturday Review contends that Swinburne “catches the very spirit of the old story,” and Van Doorn offsets that assertion by saying that he wonders whether “the reviewer knew a good version of ‘the old story’”(276-7). The essayist then dismisses the review in the Athenaeum as “too silly for words” (277), and exercises as much presumption in disapproving H. Beers’s assessment of Swinburne’s poem within the former’s 1902 A History of English Romanticism in the XIX Century, where he elevates Swinburne’s treatment of the Balin story above Tennyson’s in part because the younger poet’s fidelity to his medieval source reflects what Beers calls, “the true romantic method” (277). Not surprisingly, Van Doorn finds Jiriczek’s pronouncement of The Tale of Balen as “a little epic master-piece” in the 1911 Viktarianische Dichtung as being as misguided as the remarks of the poem’s other proponents.

In his essay’s sixth, and final, section, Van Doorn (finally) engages matters related to Swinburne’s narrative technique, the article’s ostensible purpose. Here, too, the critic assumes an antagonistic disposition toward the poem. With implied reference to Swinburne, Van Doorn begins by asserting that a poet who consistently lapses into redundancy does so for two reasons: “exuberance of temperament,” and “the verse-pattern chosen by the poet” (278). The first cause—“exuberance of temperament”—compels the poet to emphasize passages with variegated repetitions that give way to mismatched metaphors and other inconsistencies, and it also drives the poet to “sheer rant,” according to Van Doorn (278). The second source—“the verse-pattern”—promotes “padding” when the verse form and meter are intricate, because of their relentless demands. Such leads Van Doorn to assert that the narrative poet, as opposed to the lyric, ought to select a simple metrical form since narration requires progression and accordingly a certain amount of compositional freedom. On this point, the critic mentions the virtues of blank verse and heroic couplets for story-telling. With the proper poetic vehicles established, Van Doorn (astutely) identifies Swinburne’s stanza in The Tale of Balen as that Tennyson employs in “The Lady of Shalott,” which is difficult, but which the latter poet handles masterfully in his comparatively short poem, one more impressionistic than narrative.

Swinburne’s appropriation of the stanza proves impractical, according to Van Doorn, because of the poem’s epic scope (which overshadows “its attempts at nature-symbolism”) and duration, which runs two hundred fifty three stanzas in seven sections (of thirteen, twenty-two, twenty-one, twenty-four, forty-four, sixty-two, and sixty-seven stanzas, respectively) (279).

Encumbered by sustaining a demanding stanzaic form and rhyme scheme for such a span, Swinburne regresses to two poetic qualities that Van Doorn labels “cacophony” and “padding” (279). He supports his accusation by defining each attribute and then by listing alleged instances of each one. The first, “cacophony,” manifests as “meaningless sibilancy and again and again a purposeless repetition of the same vowels,” for which the critic provides examples, although the meaninglessness and purposelessness of those textual moments remain debatable (279). The second, “padding,” Van Doorn explains in the following passage: “Sometimes the necessity of filling out a stanza causes [Swinburne] to put in merely superfluous matter. But as often as not the accessory stuff lacks all variety and is a weariness to the flesh. And frequently enough, the result is not only merely verbiage, but even sheer nonsense,—apart from the nonsense of the story as such” (281). Illustrations of this phenomenon attend its definition in Van Doorn’s article, but his judgments here, as elsewhere, often defy readers’ ready acceptance. The critic’s final verdict regarding Swinburne’s _The Tale of Balen_ is that the poet “versified an inferior version of a second-rate story” (283) and that “if William Morris had tackled the story, we should have had the realism of romanticism,” or readers would have known “that the Mediaeval mind could boast of an even greater variety than the modern” (284). Regardless of whether a reader agrees with Van Doorn’s assessment, one might well note that Swinburne, like Morris, affirmed Ruskin’s conclusions about the lively medieval spirit.

Fortunately for those who favor Swinburne’s The Tale of Balen, not all of its critics have attacked it as savagely as Van Doorn did. Nonetheless, roughly sixty years would pass before the poem received another significant scholarly treatment, or at least one in which the poem constituted a large portion of the author’s focus. We might surmise that the poem’s hiatus from academic scrutiny could be traced to Van Doorn’s panning, but no clear evidence for that attribution exists. The poem’s resurfacing in scholastic discussions accompanies a renewed interest in nineteenth-century medievalisms generally, and our poem’s revival appears in Anthony H. Harrison’s 1983 article “‘For Love of This My Brother’: Medievalism and Tragedy in Swinburne’s The Tale of Balen.”

Harrison begins his article by observing that, while Tristram of Lyonesse and some of Swinburne’s other medievalist poems had recently interested scholars, The Tale of Balen largely had not. This oversight proves unmerited, according to Harrison, “because of its unique form and usual prosody as well as its energy and poignancy,” all of which coming from Swinburne in 1896 discredits allegations that he had formerly peaked and then waned as a poet (470). Countering those charges and perhaps unwittingly replicating Van Doorn’s opening, Harrison cites reviews and subsequent criticism that extols The Tale of Balen, but without the earlier critic’s attempts at undermining those accolades. Here, Harrison relies on Clyde Hyder’s scholarship in chronicling the critical responses to Swinburne’s work. In doing so, Harrison recounts that The Times asserted that Swinburne’s poetic treatment of the Balen story is comparable in quality to Tennyson’s, and likewise offers that The Saturday Review judged the younger poet’s version as “truer to the spirit of the old story” than Tennyson’s. Harrison also presents the positive assessments of some early Swinburne critics, including T. Earle Welby, George Lafourcade, and Samuel Chew. Welby contends that The Tale of Balen embodies “the freshest, most human, most lucid, least straining long poem of Swinburne’s last twenty years…full of its own youth and of the clean sharp air of his native Northumberland” and is one of Swinburne’s “masterpieces on the great scale” (470). Similarly, Lafourcade holds the poem is “subtle and powerful” (470), and regarding its prosody, Chew notes, “the stanza is varied in tone and color to suit the sense, now light and dancing, now swift, trenchant and severe” (470).

Although these dated reviews express favorable receptions, Harrison observes that the only recent critic to affirm the poem is Jerome McGann, who regards it as “graced with a richness and artistic ease which only come when a poet’s mind and craft have reached maturity” (471). And despite McGann’s discussion of the poem, Harrison recognizes that no comprehensive and approving treatment of The Tale of Balen exists. Such a study, Harrison asserts, would serve to dispel the assumption that “Swinburne entered his dotage after 1879” and to promulgate the role that he played in cultivating the range of Victorian medievalism.

Before dealing directly with The Tale of Balen, Harrison expounds the virtues of nineteenth-century medievalism by asserting that “it was not merely a mode of post-Romantic escapism but was equally as often a means of glossing, evaluating, and redirecting contemporary developments in history, politics, literature, and art” (471). This claim may originate from the critic’s reading of Alice Chandler’s work, which he credits with ascertaining the implementation of medieval forms, settings, and stories in inculcating certain political and social purport. He also designates another (related) basis for understanding Victorian medievalism, one rooted in some writers’ conclusion that the medieval period embodied a harmonic correspondence between an individual’s work practice and society’s values. These authors include notably Carlyle, Ruskin, Arnold, and Morris. Although grouping Tennyson and Swinburne with these other medievalists may prove tempting, Harrison holds that readers should resist doing so. In the case of Tennyson, the poet held no serious scholarly interest in the middle ages; moreover, in his only major work set in medieval times, Idylls of the King, he “Victorianizes the characters, events, and moral significance of his materials” (472). That is, critical consensus holds that, in Idylls of the King, Tennyson recasts Malory’s episodes to depict allegorically the discrepancy between society’s professed beliefs and its lifestyle practices.

Unlike Tennyson, Swinburne studied medievalism and the middle ages conscientiously, but according to Harrison, tended toward portraying the period as if it were imbued with a Hellenic sense of tragic heroism and love. Expediting this tragic environment—corruption, disloyalty, and disingenuous Christianity abound in The Tale of Balen’s landscape so that the protagonists, even the most stoic, suffer from a hostile fate. With this creation, Swinburne counters the Victorian tendency to venerate the middle ages and the Arthurian world, and he argues, in effect, that one historical age contains the same moral conundrums and disappointments as another. Harrison’s conclusions about Swinburne’s Camelot admittedly resemble those McGann made previously—diagnosing the atmosphere as corrupt and its forces as malevolent. For Harrison, the conditions sustain in Balen “a kind of Greek tragic hero in medieval armor” who, notwithstanding his best intentions, falls victim to his rashness and to supernatural powers.
Again resembling Van Doorn’s essay, Harrison’s contains numerical sections, which begin after four pages of preliminary discussion, whose content I just addressed. The first division turns from the poem’s Hellenic tragedy to its formal qualities. Here, Harrison asserts that the very features that hinder modern readers—its form, prosody, and image patterns—double as archaisms that bolster both its medieval character and tragic worldview. Despite his contention that the poem’s prosody suggests medievalism, Harrison cites Swinburne’s claim within his “Dedicatory Epistle” to his collected Poems that The Tale of Balen’s versification stands in contrast to a medieval one: “The form chosen for my only narrative poem was chosen as a test of the truth of my conviction that such a work could be done better on the straitest and strictest principles of verse than on the looser and more slippery lines of medieval or modern improvisation” (474). The rigid verse pattern did not register as an impediment for the poem’s initial critics; however, recent ones have found fault with the poem’s prosody. For example, Harrison quotes Philip Henderson, who writes that “the poem has been highly praised, but a metre resembling ‘The Lady of Shallot’ becomes almost unendurable when spun out to such a length” (475). Regardless of whether a reader agrees with Henderson, his observation that Swinburne’s nine-line iambic tetrameter stanza mimics Tennyson’s holds true.

The stanza form in both poems conveys a sense of medievalism, but as Harrison notes, the basis for this impression is “nearly subliminal” (475). Nonetheless, reasons for it reside within the poems and include “the use of frequent repetition, of short lines, and dominant one-syllable words,” all of which intimate a balladic style reminiscent of a “primitive,” or medieval, past. This primeval mode correlates well with the poem’s plentiful natural imagery, which itself affords Swinburne various other effects, including one Harrison labels the “compressed depiction of intense action” and the accentuation of the poem’s tragic world-view through understatement and irony (475). Additionally, seasonal imagery serves as an organizational device in the poem because the first six sections of the poem commence with an invocation of spring and the last section symbolically with a summoning of winter. Between these markers, readers encounter numerous similes and metaphors using natural images, which amplify the association of Balen with a primitive man, a natural force, subjected to an uncontrollable tragic fate. In this regard, as Harrison astutely observes, Balen resembles another of Swinburne’s medieval protagonists, Tristram. With Balen, his identity as a primitive man vulnerable to fate emerges in part from his association, in the poem’s first stanza, with the falcon and dove, Mars and Venus, or both war and love. This confluence of both benevolent and malevolent elements symbolizes Balen’s status as a force of nature, according to Harrison. As such, Balen suggests the simplicity that Victorians, such as Ruskin and Morris, connected with the middle ages. Victorian conceptions of the medieval period emanate from the poem’s natural imagery in another way too, that is by facilitating a Pre-Raphaelite “painterly” effect, found also in Gothic tapestry: a richly-detailed landscape tableau, contrasting human events, projects the stasis of nature as a constant force impacting mankind.

In his essay’s second section, Harrison turns to his interpretive focus regarding The Tale of Balen, the idea that Swinburne couples the poem’s medievalism—in subject, form, and atmosphere—with a Greek understanding of humanity’s tragic predicament. The medieval-Greek association antedates the Victorian period as far back as the eighteenth century, a connection that Alice Chandler, among others, has documented. Additional circumstantial proof of the thematic similarity between Arthurian and Trojan themes stands as their joint preeminence as subjects within medieval romance. To establish the link within The Tale of Balen, Harrison quotes Swinburne, who, as a scholar, well knew the correspondence between the medieval and the Greek and sought to reestablish it:

The age when these [Arthurian] romances actually lived side by side with the reviving legends of Thebes and Troy, not in the crude and bloodless forms of Celtic and archaic fancy but in the ampler and manlier developments of Teutonic and medieval imagination, was the age of Dante and Chaucer…. There is no episode in the cycle of Arthurian romance more genuinely Homeric in its sublime simplicity of submission to the masterdom of fate than that which I have rather reproduced than recast in ‘The Tale of Balen’: and impossible as it is to render the text or express the spirit of the Iliad in prose or rhyme—above all, in English blank verse—it is possible in such as metre as was chosen and refashioned for this poem, to give some sense of the rage and rapture of battle for which Homer himself could only find fit and full expression by similitudes drawn like mine from … the sea. (478-9)

The commonality between Greek and medieval subjects resides, as Swinburne recognizes it, in the fatalism both cultures shared and inscribed into their mythologies. And the realization of this bond would have occurred for only few of Swinburne’s contemporaries—including perhaps Morris, Pater, Hardy, and Arnold—according to Harrison, and its discovery within Swinburne’s The Tale of Balen seems to have eluded most of its early critics, with the notable exception of Georges Lafourcade, who wrote about Swinburne’s composition of the poem by saying, “with unfailing instinct he has recaptured the essential feature of the medieval theme—the sense of unjust oppressive doom heroically endured” (479).

Harrison reveals the location and character of the poem’s fatalistic elements. First, he demonstrates that both the poem’s narrative voice and that of Merlin serve as moderators of the story’s tragedy, just as a Greek chorus provides a commentary on a hero’s fate. The role finds expression so completely in Merlin that he becomes a symbol of fate in the poem, and as Harrison writes, “the narrator, too, continually reminds us that his hero’s ‘hap was evil as his heart was good’’ (479). This virtuous soul’s incentives stem from familial and clannish loyalties, particularly those to Arthur, whose misguided decisions and directives result in kind in Balen’s actions. The discontinuity between motivation and effect promotes a morally ambiguous landscape fitting a Greek tragedy. And the symbiosis of antithetical states, their slippage, and the resulting fatalism, or doom, are likewise repeatedly reintroduced through metaphors from nature in the first stanza of each section. Although this doom haunts Balen, he meets evil and carries its burden stoically. Symbolically, he wears this affliction on his person as the sword Malison, meritoriously extracted from a damsel and relentlessly held. It serves as his cursed charm and as the instrument of his inadvertently malevolent acts, including the murders of the Lady of the Lake, Launceor, Garlon, and his brother, Balan.

Harrison tags two additional characters who serve as symbols, Arthur and Garlon. Arthur comes to represent fate first because he too endures the effects of an incomprehensible causality and second because he provokes much of Balen’s doom as the latter acts to satisfy the king. The first cause of Arthur’s symbolic value proves particularly interesting, as Harrison points out, for it allows Swinburne to incorporate a story tangential to the Balen tale, as Malory renders it, in order to emphasize his poem’s fatalistic theme. The secondary story concerns Arthur’s incest with Morgause of Orkney and the evil fruit of that union, Mordred. In this extratextual episode, Arthur finds himself powerless to alter events and their effects, and accordingly, the references to it reinforce the appearance of Balen’s doom. The veiled allusion to this portion of Arthur’s past comes as Morgause’s appearance in the poem. She shows up twice, once before Balen frees the damsel from Malison and again for the funeral of her husband, King Lot, who undertook unsuccessfully to free his brother, King Ryons, from Balen’s custody. According to Harrison, Morgause’s representations in the poem carry strong symbolic value regarding fate because, with her, “Swinburne makes ironic use of eye imagery to remind us of fate’s inevitability and complexly to suggest the ominous interaction throughout the Arthurian saga between Arthur’s blind rashness and Merlin’s futile vision” (481).

The second character-symbol Harrison identifies is Garlon, King Pellam’s brother and “the invisible evil,” who stands for Fate. In fact, it is precisely Garlon’s imperceptibility that makes him correspond so well to Fate, which too arrives unannounced. Garlon comes into the poem’s action initially just so. After Balen happens upon an “anonymous wayfaring knight accompanied by a maiden” who entreats Balen to fight Garlon, Balen agrees, with blind trust, to assist the unnamed knight. Soon afterward, startlingly, the knight falls dead with a spear-wound from an unseen assailant, later identified as Garlon, or Fate’s emissary. The victim here both resembles and contrasts with Balen. Whereas they share forebodings of doom, only Balen exhibits a stoic indifference to them, and this quality of character produces a Greek-style tragic hero. The people who fall victim to Garlon’s “invisible evil” do not, however, fulfill that model. Another such victim appears as the sorrowful father of a boy whom Garlon injured, and Garlon’s representation as doom gains substantiation with that father’s description of the evil agent as one who “walks and slays as plague’s blind breath/ slays” (483).

After establishing Arthur’s and Garlon’s roles as symbols, Harrison elaborates on Merlin’s function in the poem. Rather than hindering the destiny that he predicts, Merlin seems to hasten it in his very prognostication, however much his forecast would counter his own desire. In this way, Merlin behaves like a chorus in a Greek tragedy, or as Harrison writes, “like the role of the seer in much Greek tragedy, the role of Merlin as an unwilling functionary of Fate in The Tale intensifies the poem’s ironies and our emotional response to them” (484). Additionally, Merlin plays, according to Harrison, the part of an intermediary between Arthur and Balen—and between the story of Balen proper and the interlaced Arthurian subplots that comment thematically on the former.

Before closing his essay’s second section, Harrison revisits his assertion that Balen satisfies the criteria of a Greek tragic hero by noting that he displays both hamartia and hubris in the expected fashion. While Balen’s motivations follow from filial and fraternal values, his impulsive behavior prompts dishonorable effects. This lapse in the expected flow of moral causes and effects evinces the ethical ambiguity of the Arthurian landscape, and even if this realm frustrates readers’ expectations, it generates some psychological complexity in Balen and the poem’s other dynamic characters, because readers notice that even virtuous intentions can occasion evil effects and that even nefarious actions can stem from innocuous motives. In support of this claim, Harrison chronicles a litany of episodes in Balen’s life that illustrate this dynamic. For example, in the poem’s first fytte, a knave derides Northumberla nd and its people, and to preserve his homeland’s and his own honor, Balen kills the rogue. Although the action appears heinous, the reason for it finds justification. Similarly, Balen’s murder of the Lady of the Lake registers as abhorrent, but readers learn that by “her fell cr aft his mother died” (485). And Harrison continues his listing:

[Balen’s] killing of Launceor in self-defense results in the suicide of that knight’s beloved. His capture of King Ryons and Lot’s attempt to rescue his brother end with Lot’s death and the slaughter of “many a mother’s son.” Balen’s killing of Garlon, as prophesied, “Brought sorrow down for may a year/ On many a man in many a land.” … And, in his penultimate adventure, Balen is responsible for three other deaths. Bringing the knight Garnysshe to a garden in which his adulterous beloved lies with another, Balen watches Garnysshe rashly behead the false lovers.
Perhaps the most profound moment of this ethical uncertainty and unintended consequence comes when Balen and his brother, Balan, die at each other’s hand. This culmination affords Harrison a transition into his essay’s third, and final, section, addressing the tragic aspects of filial love in The Tale of Balen, a fated relationship Swinburne explores also in Atalanta in Calydon, “Phaedra,” and in the novels.

The thematic prominence of brotherhood takes up a suitable residence in The Tale of Balen’s medieval setting because, as Alice Chandler notes, feudalism constructed a filial relationship between all people under God their Father’s reign, or society’s very order. Additionally, the inclusion of three fraternal pairs in the poem underscores the relationship’s importance. Beyond the focal pairing—Balen and Balan—the poem presents readers with two others: King Lot and Ryons, and Pellam and Garlon. In each case, the profound sibling devotion engenders the sublime—an effect arising because “such blood ties between brothers exemplify but are not ultimately subsumed under larger secular, religious, and aesthetic systems of reciprocal filial allegiance appropriate to the feudal context” (Harrison 488). Within Swinburne’s fatally doomed world or its microcosm, the poem’s medieval landscape, the brothers who sacrifice themselves to one another, or one another’s honor, embody a type of Arthur, whose realm’s brotherly equality belies corruption and its own demise, as well as a type of Christ, whose alleged redemptive power itself represents a lie, for an atheist like Swinburne. Nonetheless, in the poem’s world, these prototypes inspire in Balen (and others) a brotherly love extending to all members of the human family, and this altruism too proves doomed. Balen’s generosity originates in his devotion to Arthur, or as Harrison asserts, “Arthur’s paternal effect upon Balen is to inspire transcendent emotions which generate selfless behavior” (489). The affect arises also within King Mark, who expresses sorrow at the death of Launceor and his lover; however, Mark follows this lament with resignation, a sentiment increasingly prevalent in the poem as it fulfills its thematic goals of expressing a fatalistic worldview. For the most part, King Mark’s and others’ example of selfless care of fellow human brothers and sisters accentuate Balen’s brotherly love—and its usually tragic consequences.

Standing in the sharpest relief from all other misfortunes involving brotherhood, Balen’s ill-fated confrontation with his brother, Balan, unfolds with bitter irony, because, even though Balen has often rushed perfunctorily to defend some filial or fraternal alliance, no affiliation compels him to challenge the knight who guards the island. Rather, only the “evil custom” of the place requires him to fight the man whom he does not recognize as his brother, and even prior to the encounter, Balen muses about how sinister a custom is that requires all knightly visitors to combat the knight who watches the island. According to Harrison, “Balen, like the reader, by now sees the ‘evil custom’ as a symbol of the whole tragic and fatal enterprise of life itself,” and “he is therefore resigned to its inevitability” (491). The conclusion may be as close as Harrison comes to expressing a theme for the poem, and with such, he attributes to Swinburne pessimism and atheism worthy of Thomas Hardy.

The critic expands upon this finding by drawing attention to the twin nature of Balen and Balan and by inferring that they are two halves of a whole entity, both trying to complete himself through various approximations of true fraternity, each attempt ending tragically but not fatally—that is, not fatally until they face each other, or each faces himself. Balen can perish only from his own virtues personified in his image, Balan, and in destroying himself, he escapes the unjust world. In his essay’s closing sentence, Harrison projects Balen’s plight onto humanity: “As Balen’s career based on thwarted filial and fraternal ideals has illustrated, this is by extension the tragedy of humanity whose pitiable fate it is to strive for fulfillment through filial, erotic, and fraternal love—but in doing so to generate only strife and be freed from frustration and suffering only in death” (492).

Harrison’s culmination regarding twin counterparts provides a nexus for discussing the next major critical piece concerning The Tale of Balen: Joseph E. Riehl’s “Swinburne’s Doublings: Tristram of Lyonesse, The Sisters, and The Tale of Balen” (1990). Riehl starts his essay much as Harrison did before him, that is, by responding to long-standing assumptions that Swinburne’s later poetry rates lowest among his output. The evidence for Riehl’s rebuttal originates in the critical assessments that Paull F. Baum and later Kerr McSweeney made on behalf of “A Nympholept” and that Benjamin F. Fisher concluded from the poet’s worksheets for Tristram of Lyonesse. Then, expanding the basis for Swinburne’s later poetry’s revaluation, Riehl contends that the aging poet symbolically negotiated his image as a social individual at the Pines with that of the reclusive artist by writing a “Shakespearean doubling” of characters in three later long poems (1). The device of doubling has precedence in Swinburne’s work because, as Jerome McGann has argued, Swinburne used grammatical doubling, or pairing words, not only to add poetic value, but also to suggest the unity of existence. For Riehl, these grammatical doublings (with their noted purpose) extend to characters. In the three works on which Riehl focuses—Tristram of Lyonesse (1882), The Sisters: A Tragedy (1892), and The Tale of Balen (1896)—Swinburne casts character-pairs either who are twins or who share a name. Riehl holds that, with the character duos in these poems, relationships between paired figures metaphorically perform “psychic integration,” and in his essay, the critic devotes one of three sections to each of the aforementioned works. Because of the present edition’s scope, our attention will turn directly to Riehl’s third section, on The Tale of Balen.

There, Riehl draws his readers’ awareness to Swinburne’s concurrent composition of The Tale of Balen and the lyric poem “The Altar of Righteousness.” The latter poem attributes all of the world’s religions to humanity’s misunderstanding, in much the same way that Blake’s prophetic poems do. That is, instead of espousing a traditionally religious view of divinity, Swinburne adopts a Gnostic one, positing that, before the formulation of doctrines, mankind intuited ethical behavior through a “transcendent connection with a spirit of truth,” but one distinct from nature (6). Although this vital force remains with humanity, man’s fixed religion obscures the power’s presence within him. This befuddlement arises because man labels fate as God and because he withholds his own innate truth. Ironically, man institutes and eventually rejects one religion for another, and in doing so, acts as a god, but while he believes in his own construction, he fears himself. Swinburne’s poem “The Altar of Righteousness” explores this distorted dynamic as it occurs within Christianity too. Christ’s incarnation serves to remind humanity of its inner divinity, but the ensuing Church conflates Christ with the image of the Old Testament’s oppressive Father, personified in the early Church by Saint Paul. These thematic assertions find a parallel with those in The Tale of Balen when Riehl observes that Swinburne wrote to Watts in August of 1895, in effect, that “‘The Altar of Righteousness’ embodied an opposition between Hebraism and Hellenism” (7). For the ancient Hebrews, natural forces dispense God’s judgments and thereby have a direct correlating effect on humanity; however, for the Greeks, nature acts impersonally and indifferently to human lives. In “The Altar of Righteousness,” Swinburne privileges the latter, Hellenic, worldview over the former, Hebrew, and in The Tale of Balen, the logic of the Hellenic scheme animates Balen’s world.

Such deliberation regarding The Tale of Balen’s didacticism may seem improbable given Swinburne’s relative precision in rendering Malory’s story, an allegiance Swinburne acknowledged at least twice, according to Riehl, once in a letter to Molesworth, and again in his “Dedicatory Epistle” (8). Moreover, the poet had various motivations for composing a poem, including his self-identification with and affinity for Northumberlanders, of whom Balen is one. Additionally, in 1891, Swinburne lost his brother Edward, to whom the poet lacked strong attachment, but whose death might have nonetheless inspired in the poet some reflection on the meaning of brotherhood. Perhaps the most cited cause for Swinburne’s composition of The Tale of Balen concerns his correcting Tennyson’s misrepresentation of Malory’s story ten years earlier in The Idylls of the King. Swinburne’s restorative efforts should not, according to Riehl, be construed as a transcription of Malory’s plot, but rather, as a realization of its capacity “to express a powerful understanding of fate” (8).

A variance from Malory that both Tennyson and Swinburne maintain comes as their representing Balen and Balan as twin brothers—a detail that affords the two Victorian poets the ability to consider the twins as divided parts of a human psyche. For Tennyson, this psychological division expresses itself in a Freudian paradigm:

> Tennyson sees the idyll of Balin … as an allegory in which Balin the Savage represents the uncontrollable urges which would destroy the Round Table. In Tennyson’s version, Balin attempts to suppress his rages, but when he learns of Guenevere’s infidelity, he destroys his shield and utters a wild cry which his brother Balan assumes is the bellow of a wood-devil. Unable to recognize his now shieldless brother, Balan and Balin mutually destroy each other. Rationality and primitive emotion join in battle, and both die…. Tennyson’s Balin and Balan is a Freudian allegory in which the struggle between the inborn violence of Balin and the reasoned propriety of Balan eventually destroys them both. (Riehl 9)

With Swinburne’s inclusion of the brother’s twin nature, readers may well construe the same psychological scheme at work in The Tale of Balen, but Riehl distinguishes a variance between Swinburne’s Balen and Tennyson’s Balin—namely that Balen behaves not rashly, but rather defiantly, in light of his fate—that challenges a Freudian diagnosis, and leads to a Jungian finding of coincidentia oppositorum. Riehl’s contention that Balen and Balan form a perfect complementary pair allows the critic to assert that the two men, when reunited, produce a single whole, an individual in step with Truth, such as the one Swinburne describes in “The Altar of Righteousness.”

This unity emerging from the two brothers fails to hold in this world, though, and the poem’s description evinces this disjuncture with paradoxical language speaking simultaneously to the brothers’ singularity and division. Additional circumstantial evidence of their vexed union appears in the episode immediately prior to the brothers’ reunion, an incident when, after Balen kills Launceor, his lady, upon seeing her lover slain, commits suicide and says, “Two bodies and one heart thou hast slain,/ Two hearts within one body” (Riehl 10). The two may indeed live in perfect unity, but only in an afterlife, and the same reality likewise holds for Swinburne’s Tristram and Iseult. In death, Balen and Balen too will find wholeness, or divine integration, and there, will transcend a world ruled by a vengeful god, the Jehovah of “The Altar of Righteousness.”

In life, Balen (and Balan) oscillate between a relative wholeness and a disunity of self, depending, respectively, on whether the twin brothers are together or apart. For example, when Balen battles Pellam in his castle, away from Balan, Balen overlooks his “second sword,” an emblem of his complementary identity, and instead brandishes the Spear of Longinus, a religious artifact that he finds in Pellam’s fortress, but moreover a weapon symbolizing Balen’s appropriation of a disorienting religion. Proper orientation, integration between the brothers, breaks down initially when Balen leaves the Northumbrian childhood home he shared with his brother for Arthur’s court, which holds the societal forces that, in fear, promote religion to displace innate divinity (wholeness). After entering Camelot, Balen meets only one endeavor with unmitigated success, the battle against King Ryon, and according to Riehl, it prevails precisely because Balen and Balan fight together again. In other conflicts, Balen acts independently of his twin brother, and regardless of intention, Balen triggers inadvertent consequences. Hence, Balen’s fate strikes readers as accidental, but actually, it follows an intricate sequence of cultural (or socially conditioned) causes and effects. Complicating this fate, the natural world and time’s passage operate indifferently to human desires. Balen’s heroic supremacy emerges symbolically with his final, deadly reunion with his brother, Balan, but he merits this fulfillment “through a sustained refusal to accept guilt for what fate has compelled him to do” (Riehl 13).

By exhibiting his selfhood in this manner, Balen reveals himself as a Christ-figure, or as one who does not fear the circumstances and natural forces people generally identify as fate and as one who bravely embraces death issued by a broken world. This analogy between Balen and Christ finds corroboration in detailing that Riehl references:

Balen metes out “the dolorous stroke” to Pellam with the lance that pierced the side of Christ. Forgetting his second sword, Belen takes up the relic “Spear of Longinus” of the Parsival legend, and wounds King Pellam, engendering cosmic repercussions. In the ensuing fight at Pellam’s castle, an evocation of the myth of the Fisher King, Pellam and Balan join together as a single sacrificial victim, and as the king falls, the walls of the castle are “rent from base to crown,” recalling the temple veil “rent from the top to the bottom” (Matthew 27.51) at Christ’s death. Both men lie together for three days in “death’s blind kingdom,” suggesting that they share in reenacting the three days Christ lay in the tomb. (Riehl 13)

The resemblance would seem to wane, however, because, after the events recounted, Pellam’s followers regard Balen as a tyrant, not a savior. Reconciling the story of Balen with that of Christ, Riehl amplifies the Biblical narrative with Swinburne’s account of Christ’s mishandling by the Church, as presented in “The Altar of Righteousness.” Given Christianity’s corruption, or the Pauline conflation of Christ with the Old Testament’s Jehovah, Balen’s defamation by those whom he liberated from Garlon, corresponds to the Church’s misunderstanding of the gospel. In the poem, Balen unwillingly suffers Pellam’s fate and precipitates devastation because people have misjudged him. Swinburne’s teaching, like Blake’s, tells readers that, in this world, a truth will invariably be muddled with a lie. Nonetheless, the parallel that Swinburne draws between Balen and Christ does, according to Riehl, lead to one final point in the poem, which is that the brothers’ death ends the evil “custom” of knights’ fighting on the island. Although Riehl does not articulate the Christian correspondence, readers can easily connect that custom’s dissolution with any number of practices that ceased with the conveyance of the Old Covenant to the New.

Riehl closes his article with a sentiment regarding The Tale of Balen that seems apropos as I close this summary of significant critical responses to the poem: “Those who have found the poem defective because it closely emulates Malory do not consider how deftly Swinburne turned Malory’s tale to his own account” (15).
Editorial Observations from Transcribing the Manuscript and Collating Editions

In the edition proper of The Tale of Balen, which follows this introduction, I attempt to reproduce as faithfully and transparently as possible first the poet’s final intention for the work as evident in the poem’s manuscript, the alterations the poet executed within the manuscript in arriving at that final manuscript version, and variances from the former visible in the two editions published during the poet’s lifetime—Chatto & Windus 1896 and Chatto & Windus 1904—which latter could reflect either Swinburne’s desired change or that of his editors. Having transcribed and documented the text’s evolution during the scope of the poet’s life, in a variorum-like fashion, I wish to allow my readers to draw their own conclusions, rather than directing those findings and perhaps limiting their vision. Nonetheless, I would like to draw readers’ attention to some phenomena rather apparent from the manuscript and the first two published editions of the poem.

First, I would like to feature Swinburne’s handwritten practice of substituting the ampersand (&) for the word and, consistently, except when the word begins a line of poetry or a sentence. The habit might have resulted from Swinburne’s weak wrist, which could have prompted him to abbreviate whenever possible, but his use of the ampersand seems so systematized that readers should at least consider other motivations. One may relate to the long history of the symbol, dating back to the first century A.D. Latin cursive, which employed the symbol as a ligature of the two letters “et” spelling the Latin word meaning and. Considering Swinburne’s affinity for archaicism, which would well suit a work with a medieval setting, readers might ponder whether the poet might have used the symbol to add an ancient or medieval impression to the work.
Swinburne’s practice of employing language and forms that project a particular locale or era is well established. As I read the following edition of The Tale of Balen and observe the poet’s verbal modifications, I discern that he often sacrifices a pedestrian word for one that conjures a sense of a time and place much older than his own or for one that facilitates an alliterative line reminiscent of Old English verse. Other readers may well notice other patterns of apparent motivation for Swinburne’s alterations.

I would note also that, despite the numerous changes Swinburne makes in the manuscript, the number of unaltered passages registers as significant too. That is, Swinburne does a remarkable job of making few mistakes, or at least finding a final wording with his initial take. Also, as I have become increasingly familiar with Swinburne’s method of textual adaptation, I am struck by an inherent economy therein. For instance, in exchanging words with the same initial sound(s), the poet strikes out only those letters that he is replacing and writes only the letters replaced. These compositional practices testify to, or at least substantiate, Swinburne’s literary genius.

Moreover, I hope that the present edition of The Tale of Balen will assist in putting to rest two allegations against Swinburne and the poem: first, the charge that the poet’s talents waned after the 1870’s; second, the charge that The Tale of Balen comprises Swinburne’s mere paraphrase of Malory’s account of Balin. Consideration of Swinburne’s technique, apparent in the manuscript’s transcription, foils both of these aspersions.
A Guide to Using the Edition

The present edition of The Tale of Balen assumes as its foundation Swinburne’s final intention as expressed in the poem’s manuscript, which The British Library holds and catalogues as Ashley 4409, and this version of the poem appears on the current edition’s pages above the dividing line. By coupling this portion of each page with the poet’s modifications to the manuscript, appearing below the page’s line and denoted by the abbreviation MS, a reader could construct essentially a transcription of the total content of the manuscript’s pages. This edition, however, extends its survey beyond the manuscript to include variances from the final manuscript intention, articulated in the poem’s first two editions—Chatto & Windus 1896 (C&W 1896) and Chatto & Windus 1904 (C&W1904)—both of which appeared during Swinburne’s lifetime and accordingly could bear witness to his intentions regarding the poem.

The edition’s methodology for documenting emendations and amendments, within the manuscript and between its finalized version and either of the subsequent editions, adheres to the notation and practices recommended by Mary Jo Kline in A Guide to Documentary Editing. Insertions, or added words, appear between carets (^insertion^); deletions, or deleted words, are italicized between brackets of the following shape (<deletion>); and editorial changes are bracketed ([editorial change]). Sometimes these symbols are compounded, or used in conjunction with each other, in which case they should be treated in an algebraic fashion—that is, read from the inside out. For example, the following combination--<^added, then deleted^>--suggests that the bracketed words were added and then deleted. Also, rarely but sometimes, Swinburne’s emendations are stuck out so completely that they are illegible, in which cases the phenomenon is marked with brackets and an ellipse: <…>. Notations that do not lend themselves to interpretation from these explanations will be accompanied by a footnote.
Dedication.

To my Mother,
Love that holds life & death in fee,
Deep as the clear unsounded sea
And sweet as life or death can be,
Lays here my hope, my heart, & me,
Before you, silent, in a song.
Since the old wild tale, made new, found grace,
When half sung through, before your face,
It needs must live a springtide space,
While April suns grow strong.

March 24, 1896.

1  [DEDICATION.] C&W 1896
1  [DEDICATION] C&W 1904
2  [TO MY MOTHER.] C&W 1896
2  [TO MY MOTHER] C&W 1904
3  [LOVE] that holds life [and] death in fee, C&W 1896\(^1\)
3  [LOVE] that holds life [and] death in fee, C&W 1904\(^2\)
7  Before you\(\ldots\) ^, silent,^ in a song MS

\(^1\) In the poem’s manuscript, Swinburne uses the ampersand consistently for the word and, with the exception of the word’s occurrence at the beginning of a sentence or a poetic line. All of the publishing editors replace the symbol with the word.

\(^2\) Almost without exception, editorial changes for the Chatto and Windus 1896 edition of the poem are carried over to the publisher’s 1904 edition of the poem. Any variance from this pattern will be noted.
The Tale of Balen

I.

In hawthorne-time the heart grows light,
The world is sweet in sound & sight,
Glad thoughts & birds take flower & flight,
The heather kindles toward the light,
    The whin is frankincense & flame.
And be it for strife or be it for love
The falcon quickens as the dove
When earth is touched from heaven above
    With joy that knows no name.
2
And glad in spirit & sad in soul
With dream & doubt of days that roll
As waves that race & find no goal
Rode on by bush & brake & bole
   A northern child of earth & sea.
The pride of life before him lay
Radiant: the heavens of night & day
Shone less than shone before his way
   His ways & days to be.

25

26  <For> ^With^ dream & doubt of days that roll  MS
27  As waves that ^race &^ find no goal<,>  MS
28  <Fade...> Rode on by bush & brake & bole  MS
32  Shone less than shone before his way<...>  MS
And all his life of blood & breath
Sang out within him: time & death
Were even as words a dreamer saith
When sleep within him slackeneth,
   And light & life & spring were one.
The steed between his knees that sprang,
The moors & woods that shone & sang,
The hours wherethro’ the spring’s breath rang,
   Seemed ageless as the sun.

35  <But heavier than his heart was he>
   And all <…> his life of blood & breath  MS
39  And light & life ^& spring^ were one  MS
42  The <skies> ^hours^ wherethro’ the spring’s breath rang,  MS¹
42  The hours [wherethrough] the spring’s breath rang,  C&W 1896
43  <Seemed…> Seemed ageless as the sun.  MS

¹ In the manuscript, Swinburne would sometimes abbreviate the letters ough in words, with the letter o with a line drawn over it. Published editions of the poem, of course, render the words with the complete spelling.
But alway thro’ the bounteous bloom
That earth gives thanks if heaven illume
His soul forefelt a shadow of doom,
His heart foreknew a gloomier gloom
    Than closes all men’s equal ways,
Albeit the spirit of life’s light spring
With pride of heart upheld him, king
And lord of hours like snakes that sting
    And nights that darken days.
And as the strong spring round him grew
Stronger, & all blithe winds that blew
Blither, & flowers that flowered anew
More glad of sun & air & dew,

    The shadow lightened on his soul
And brightened into death & died
Like winter, as the bloom waxed wide
From woodside on to riverside

    And southward goal to goal.

61  Like winter, <slain of> as the bloom waxed wide  MS
Along the wandering ways of Tyne,
By beech & birch & thorn that shine
And laugh when life’s requickening wine
Makes night & noon & dawn divine
And stirs in all the veins of spring,
And past the brightening banks of Tees,
He rode as one that breathes & sees
A sun more blithe, a merrier breeze,
A life that hails him king.

66  <Thro’> ^By^ beech & birch & thorn that shine
71  <And streams that yearn toward …seas>
    He rode <elate> as one that ^breathes &^ sees.
72  <And breathes…> ^A sun more^ blithe, a merrier breeze,
73  A life that hail<ed>^s^ him king.
And down the softening south that knows
No more how glad the heather glows,
Nor how, when winter’s clarion blows
Across the bright Northumbrian snows,
      Sea-mists from east & westward meet,
Past Avon senseless yet of song
And Thames that bore but swans in throng
He rode elate in heart & strong
      In trust of days as sweet.

76  <Less yet & less of storms & snows> MS
76  No more how <broad> the heather glows,  MS
77  <And> ^Nor^ how, when winter’s <…> clarion blows  MS
So came he through to Camelot,
Glad, tho’ for shame his heart waxed hot,
For hope within it withered not
To see the shaft it dreamed of shot

Fair toward the glimmering goal of fame.

And all King Arthur’s knightliest there
Approved him knightly, swift to dare
And keen to bid their records bear
Sir Balen’s northern name.

85
86  Glad, [though] for shame his heart waxed hot,  C&W 1896
89  Fair toward the <…> glimmering goal of fame.  MS
90  And all <of> King Arthur’s knightliest there  MS
Sir Balen of Northumberland
Gat grace before the king to stand
High as his heart was, & his hand
Wrought honour toward the strange north strand
    That sent him south so goodly a knight.
And envy, sick with sense of sin,
Began as poisonous herbs begin
To work in base men’s blood, akin
    To men’s of nobler might.

97  <High not least> High as his heart was, & his hand  MS
98  W<…>rought honour toward the strange north strand  MS
103  To <nobler> ^men`s^ of <lordlier> ^nobler^ might.  MS
And even so fell it that his doom,
For all his bright life’s kindling bloom
And light that took no thought for gloom,
Fell as a breath from the opening tomb
    Full on him ere he wist or thought.
For once a churl of royal seed,
King Arthur’s kinsman, faint in deed
And loud in word that knew not heed,
    Spake shame where shame was naught.

107  And <pride> light that took no thought for gloom,
109  Full on him ere wist or <feared> ^thought^.
113  Spake <…> shame where shame was naught.
113  Spake shame where shame was n[o]ught.
‘What doth one here in Camelot
Whose birth was northward? Wot we not
As all his brethren borderers wot
How blind of heart, how keen & hot,
   The wild north lives & hates the south?
Men of the narrowing march that knows
Nought save the strength of storms & snows,
What would these carles where knighthood blows
   A trump of kinglike mouth?’
Swift from his place leapt Balen, smote
The liar across his face, & wrote
His wrath in blood upon the bloat
Brute cheek that challenged shame for note
   How vile a king-born knave might be.
Forth sprang their swords, & Balen slew
The knave ere well one witness knew
Of all that round them stood or drew
   What sight was there to see.

131  The knave ere well <the> one witness knew  MS
Then spake the great king’s wrathful will
A doom for six dark months to fill
Wherein close prison held him, still
And steadfast-souled for good or ill.
    But when those weary days lay dead
His lordliest knights & barons spake
Before the king for Balen’s sake
Good speech & wise, of force to break
    The bonds that bowed his head.
1.
In linden-time the heart is high
For pride of summer passing by
With lordly laughter in her eye;
A heavy splendour in the sky
    Uplifts & bows it down again.
The spring had waned from wood & wold
Since Balen left his prison hold
And lowlier-hearted than of old
    Beheld it wax & wane.

147  In linden-time the <world> ^heart^ is <sweet> <^glad^> high MS
147  [IN] linden-time the heart is high C&W 1896
151  <Exults> ^Uplifts^ & bows it down again. MS

2.
Though humble heart & poor array
Reft not from spirit & sense away
Their noble nature, nor could slay
The pride they bade but pause & stay
    Till time should bring its trust to flower,
Yet even for noble shame’s sake, born
Of hope that smiled on hate & scorn,
He held him still as earth ere morn
    Ring forth her rapturous hour.

158  [Kept] not from spirit [and] sense away

C&W 1896
3
But even as earth when dawn takes flight
And beats her wings of dewy light
Full in the faltering face of night,
His soul awoke to claim by right

The life & death of deed & doom,
When once before the king there came
A maiden clad with grief & shame
And anguish burning her like flame

That feeds on flowers in bloom.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Line</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>170</td>
<td>His soul awoke to claim of by* right*   MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>171</td>
<td>The woeful wonder  sign that sealed his   MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>172</td>
<td>When came once before the king there came  MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>173</td>
<td>A maiden girt for  clad with  grief &amp; shame  MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>175</td>
<td>With steel That feeds on flowers in bloom.   MS</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Swinburne here discontinues placing a period after the stanza’s numbering, a practice that he sometimes resumes later on.
Beneath a royal mantle, fair
With goodly work of lustrous vair,
Girt fast against her side she bare
A sword whose weight bade all men there
    Quail to behold her face again.
Save of a passing perfect knight
Not great alone in force or fight
It might not be for any might Drawn forth, & end her pain.

179  <A heavy> Girt fast <about> ^against^ her side she bare  MS
181  Quail to behold <her breathless pain> ^her face again.^  MS
182  <Yet might not this be drawn, she said,>
    ^Save of a passing perfect knight^  MS
183  Not  ^great^ alone in force <&> ^or^ fight  MS
183  Not great alone in force [and] fight  C&W 1896
So spake she: then King Arthur spake:
‘Albeit indeed I dare not take
Such praise on me, for knighthood’s sake
And love of ladies will I make
    Assay if better none may be.’
By girdle & by sheath he caught
The sheath & girded sword, & wrought
With strength whose force availed him nought
    To save & set her free.
6.
Again she spake: ‘No need to set
The might that man has matched not yet
Against it: he whose hand shall get
Grace to release the bonds that fret
   My bosom & my girdlestead
With little strain of strength or strife
Shall bring me as from death to life
And win to sister or to wife
   Fame that outlives men dead.’

203  Shall <set> ^bring^ me as from death to life
205  <Praise> ^Fame^ that outlives men dead.’
Then bade the king his knights assay
This mystery that before him lay
And mocked his might of manhood. ‘Nay,’
Quoth she, ‘the man that takes away
This burden laid on me must be
A knight of record clean & fair
As sunlight & the flowerful air,
By sire & mother born to bear
A name to shame not me’.

215 A name to shame not me[.]

1 Swinburne apparently disregards any standard for the end-quotation mark’s relationship to the ending punctuation. I attempt to bear witness to this phenomenon in my treatment of the manuscript.
Then forth strode Launcelot, & laid
The mighty-moulded hand that made
Strong knights reel back like birds affrayed
By storm that smote them as they strayed
Against the hilt that yielded not.

Then Tristram, bright & sad & kind
As one that bore in noble mind
Love that made light as darkness blind,
Fared even as Launcelot.
9.
Then Lamoracke, with hardier cheer,
As one that held all hope & fear
Wherethro’ the spirit of man may steer
In life & death less dark or dear,
   Laid hand thereon, & fared as they.
With half a smile his hand he drew
Back from the spell-bound thing, & threw
With half a glance his heart anew
   Toward no such blameless may.

229 [Wherethrough] the spirit of man may steer
231 <Laid lightlier hand thereto> C&W 1896
231 <And smiles to take the helm & steer,> MS
231 <Laid lightlier hand> MS¹
235 <Toward her> Toward no such blameless may. MS

¹ Swinburne makes a series of false starts for the line I have numbered 231. Each false start receives a distinct line in the manuscript, and Swinburne strikes through each of these aborted lines.
10. Between Iseult & Guenevere
Sat one of name as high to hear,
But darklier doomed than they, whose cheer
Foreshowed not yet the deadlier year
That bids the queenliest head bow down,
The queen Morgause of Orkney: they
With scarce a flash of the eye could say
The very word of dawn, when day
Gives earth & heaven their crown.

239 But dark^li^er doomed than they, whose cheer MS
239 But darklier doomed than they[< , >] whose cheer C&W 1896

\(^1\) In Swinburne’s manuscript and in the first two published editions, an empty space often appears before and after a colon or semicolon. Although I do not maintain this practice in my edition, an exacting documentary scholar would wish to note the same.
11.
But bright & dark as night or noon
And lowering as a storm-flushed moon
When clouds & thwarting winds distune
The music of the midnight, soon
   To die from darkening star to star
And leave a silence in the skies
That yearns till dawn find voice & rise,
Shone strange as fate Morgause, with eyes
   That dwelt on days afar.

246 11. <…>
248 <She glanced from him toward Arthur>
   ^And lowering as a storm-flushed moon^
251 To die from ^darkening^ star to star
254 Shone <where she stood> <^from her throne^>
   ^strange as fate^ Morgause, with eyes

MS
A glance that shot on Lamoracke
As from a storm-cloud bright & black
Fire swift & blind as death’s own track,
Turned fleet as flame on Arthur back
   From him whose hand forsook the hilt:
And one in blood & one in sin
Their hearts caught fire of pain within
And knew no goal for them to win
   But death that guerdons guilt.

---

257 <With eye> ^A glance^ that shot on Lamoracke MS
258 As from a storm-cloud <*>^cloud’s heart^> bright & black MS¹
259 Fire <*>^that he^> swift & blind as death’s own track, MS
259 Fire swift & blind as death’s own track[<,>] C&W 1896
260 <She glanced from him> <>^Turned^> ^Turned^ <>^again^>
   ^fleet as flame^ on Arthur back MS

¹ The aborted replacement phrase “cloud’s heart” appears directly above the phrase “storm-cloud” in the manuscript.
Then Gawain, sweet of soul & gay
As April ere he dreams of May,
Strove, & prevailed not: then Sir Kay,
The snake-souled envier, vile as they
That fawn & foam & lurk & lie,
Sire of the bastard band whose brood
Was alway found at servile feud
With honour, faint & false & lewd,
Scarce grasped & put it by.
14.
Then wept for woe the damsel bound
With iron & with anguish round,
That none to help her grief was found
Or loose the inextricably inwound
   Grim curse that girt her life with grief
And made a burden of her breath,
Harsh as the bitterness of death.
Then spake the king as one that saith
   Words bitterer even than brief.

277  Then wept <aloud> ^for woe^ the damsel bound  MS
‘Methought the wide round world could bring
Before the face of queen or king
No knights more fit for fame to sing
Than fill this full Round Table’s ring
    With honour higher than pride of place:
But now my heart is wrung to know,
Damsel, that none whom fame can show
Finds grace to heal or help thy woe:
    God gives them not the grace.’
16.
Then from the lowliest place thereby,
With heart-enkindled cheek & eye
Most like the star & kindling sky
That say the sundawn’s hour is high
    When rapture trembles through the sea,
Strode Balen in his poor array
Forth, & took heart of grace to pray
The damsel suffer even him to assay
    His power to set her free.

302  <Rose> Strode Balen in his poor array  MS
304  The damsel suffer ^even^ him <too> to assay  MS
17.
Nay, how should he avail, she said,
Averse with scorn-averted head,
Where these availeth not? None had sped
Of all these mightier men that led

The lists wherein he might not ride,
And how should less men speed? But he,
With lordlier pride of courtesy,
Put forth his hand & set her free

From pain & humbled pride.

309 Where these availed not? None h<e>™d™ sped MS
310 Of all these <…> ^mightier^ men that led MS
312 And how <…> should less men speed? But he, MS
18.
But on the sword he gazed elate
With hope set higher than fear or fate,
Or doubt of darkling days in wait;
And when her thankful praise waxed great
And craved of him the sword again,
He would not give it. ‘Nay, for mine
It is till force may make it thine’.
A smile that shone as death may shine
Spake toward him bale & bane.
Strange lightning flickered from her eyes.
‘Gentle & good in knightliest guise
And meet for quest of strange emprise
Thou hast here approved thee; yet not wise
To keep the sword from me, I wis.
For with it thou shalt surely slay
Of all that look upon the day
The man best loved of thee, & lay
Thine own life down for his.’
‘What chance God sends, that chance I take’,
He said. Then soft & still she spake;
‘I would but for thine only sake
Have back the sword of thee, & break
The links of doom that bind thee round.
But seeing thou wilt not have it so,
My heart for thine is wrung with woe’.
God’s will’, quoth he, ‘it is, we know,
Wherewith our lives are bound’.

337 ‘What chance God sends, that chance I take[,]’
338 He said. Then soft<er yet> & still^ she spake;
339 ‘I would but <…> for thine only sake
342 But seeing thou wilt not ^hear or know^ ^have it so,^
343 My heart for thine is wrung with woe[,]’
344 God’s will <it is,’ quoth he,> ^quoth he, ‘it is^ we know,
344 God’s will[,]’ quoth he, ‘it is we know,
345 Wherewith our lives are bound[,]’

C&W 1896
MS
C&W 1896
C&W 1896
C&W 1896
C&W 1896
‘Repent it must thou soon’, she said,
‘Who wouldst not hear the rede I read
For thine & not for my sake, sped
For vain as waters heavenward shed
From springs that falter, & depart
Earthward. God bids not thee believe
Truth, & the web thy life must weave
For even this sword to close & cleave
Hangs heavy round my heart.’
So passed she mourning forth. But he,
With heart of springing hope set free
As birds that breast & brave the sea,
Bade horse & arms & armour be
    Made straightway ready toward the fray.
Nor even might Arthur's royal prayer
Withhold him, but with frank & fair
Thanksgiving & leavetaking there
    He turned him thence away.

358  <Bade horse & <spear> & arms & armour be & with heart>  MS
358  <Straightway to hand> ^With heart of springing hope set free^  MS¹
361  Made straightway ready <for his guest> ^thence to part^  MS
362  Nor even might Arthur's royal <plea> prayer  MS
364  Thanksgiving & [leave-taking] there  C&W 1896
365  He <passed from all> ^turned him thence^ away.  MS
366  <(End of Fytte 2nd)>  MS

¹ Swinburne struck out two whole drafted lines before he wrote their replacement on a third.
III.

1

As the east wind, when the morning’s breast
Gleams like a bird’s that leaves the nest,
A fledgeling halcyon’s bound on quest
Drives wave on wave on wave to west
   Till all the sea be life & light,
So time’s mute breath, that brings to bloom
All flowers that strew the dead spring’s tomb,
Drives day on day on day to doom
   Till all man’s day be night.

370  <Scarce fledged <^...^> & ... quickening <^...^> toward its quest,>
     ^A fledgling halcyon’s bound on quest^  MS
Brief as the breaking of a wave
That hurls on man his thunderous grave
Ere fear find breath to cry or crave
Life that no chance may spare or save,
   The light of joy & glory shone
Even as in dreams where death seems dead
Round Balen’s hope-exalted head,
Shone, passed, & lightened as it fled
   The shadow of doom thereon.

382 <Fle> The light of joy & glory shone  MS
383 <O> Even as in dreams <ere with starlight fled>
   ^where death seems dead^  MS
384 Round Balen’s <bright-uplifted> ^hope-exalted^ head,  MS
386 The <crown> shadow of doom thereon.  MS
For as he bound him thence to fare,
Before the stately presence there
A lady like a wind-flower fair,
Girt on with raiment strange & rare
    That rippled whispering round her, came.
Her clear cold eyes, all glassy grey,
Seemed lit not with the light of day
But touched with gleams that waned away
    Of quelled & fading flame.
Before the king she bowed & spake:
‘King, for thine old faith’s plighted sake
To me the lady of the lake,
I come in trust of thee to take
    The guerdon of the gift I gave,
Thy sword Excalibar.’ And he Made answer: ‘Be it whate’er it be,
If mine to give, I give it thee,
    Nor need is thine to crave.’

399  ‘King for thine old <word> faith’s plighted sake    MS
As when a gleam of wicked light
Turns half a low-lying water bright
That moans beneath the shivering night
With sense of evil sound & sight
And whispering witchcraft’s bated breath,
Her wan face quickened as she said:
‘This knight that won the sword – his head
I crave or hers that brought it. Dead,
Let these be one in death.’
6.
‘Not with mine honour this may be;
Ask all save this thou wilt,’ quoth he,
‘And have thy full desire.’ But she 420
Made answer; ‘Nought will I of thee,
    Nought if not this.’ Then Balen turned,
And saw the sorceress hard beside
By whose fell craft his mother died:
Three years he had sought her, & here espied 425
    His heart against her yearned.

421 Made answer[:] ‘Nought will I of thee, C&W 1896
423 And saw the sorceress <there> ^hard^ beside MS
424 By whose fell craft <…> his mother died: MS
425 Three <h…> years he had sought her, & here espied MS
‘Ill be thou met,’ he said, ‘whose ire
Would slake with blood thy soul’s desire:
By thee my mother died in fire;
Die thou by me a death less dire.’

Sharp flashed his sword forth, fleet as flame,
And shore away her sorcerous head.
‘Alas for shame,’ the high king said,
‘That one found once my friend lies dead:
Alas for all our shame!’
8.
‘Thou shouldst have here forborne her; yea,
Were all the wrongs that bid men slay
Thine, heaped too high for wrath to weigh,
Not here before my face to-day
   Was thine the right to wreak thy wrong.’
Still stood he there as one that found
His rose of hope by storm discrowned,
And all the joy that girt him round
   Brief as a broken song.
Yet ere he passed he turned & spake:
‘King, only for thy nobler sake
Than aught of power man’s power may take
Or pride of place that pride may break
    I bid the lordlier man in thee,
That lives within the king, give ear.
This justice done before thee here
On one that hell’s own heart holds dear,
    Needs might not this but be.

450  Than aught of power man’s <force>^power^ may take  MS
453  <And not> ^That lives^ within the king, gives ear.  MS
10
‘Albeit, for all that pride would prove,
My heart be wrung to lose thy love,
It yet repents me not hereof:

So many an eagle & many a dove,
    So many a knight, so many a may,
This water-snake of poisonous tongue
To death by words & wiles hath stung,
That her their slayer, from hell’s lake sprung,
    I did not ill to slay.’

459 <It brings my> ^My^ heart ^be wrung^ to lose thy love, MS
465 That her <,> their slayer, <that coiled & clung>
    ^from hell’s lake sprung^, MS
‘Yea,’ said the king, ‘too high of heart
To stand before a king thou art:
Yet irks it me to bid thee part
And take thy penance for thy part,
    That God may put upon thy pride.’
Then Balen took the severed head
And toward his hostry turned & sped
As one that knew not quick from dead
    Nor good from evil tide.

469  To stand before a king thou art[;]       C&W 1896
12.
He bade this squire before him stand
And take that sanguine spoil in hand
And bear it far by shore & strand 480
Till all in glad Northumberland
That loved him, seeing it, all might know
His deadliest foe was dead, & hear
How free from prison as from fear
He dwelt in trust of the answering year
To bring him weal for woe.

478  <Here> He bade this squire <that met> ^before^ him stand  MS
483  His deadliest foe <…> was dead, & <see> hear  MS
484  How free from prison <…> as from fear  MS
13.
‘And tell them, now I take my way
To meet in battle, if I may,
King Ryons of North Wales, & slay
That king of kernes whose fiery sway
    Doth all the marches dire despite That serve King Arthur: so shall he
Again be gracious lord to me,
And I that leave thee meet with thee
    Once more in Arthur’s sight.’

491  That king of kernes whose <rude red> ^fiery^ sway  MS
494  <Prove> <Be> ^Again be^ gracious lord <...> to me,  MS
495  And I that leave <m> thee meet with thee  MS
14.
So spake he ere they parted, nor
Took shame or fear to counsellor,
As one whom none laid ambush for;
And wist not how Sir Launceor,
   The wild king’s son of Ireland, hot
And high in wrath to know that one
Stood higher in fame before the sun,
Even Balen, since the sword was won,
   Drew nigh from Camelot.

500  Nor And wist not how Sir Launceor, MS
502  The great wild king’s son of Ireland, hot MS
For thence, in heat of hate & pride,
As one that man might bid not bide,
He craved the high king’s grace to ride
On quest of Balen far & wide
    And wreak the wrong his wreath had wrought.
‘Yea’, Arthur said, ‘for such despite
Was done me never in my sight
As this thine hand shall now requite
    If trust avail us aught.’
But ere he passed, in eager mood
To feed his hate with bitter food,
Before the king’s face Merlin stood
And heard his tale of ill & good,
   Of Balen, & the sword achieved,
And whence it smote as heaven’s red ire
That direful dame of doom as dire;
And how the king’s wrath turned to fire
   The grief wherewith he grieved.

521  And heard <the> ^his^ tale <he held not> ^of ill &^ good,  MS
523  And <how> ^whence^ it smote as <lightening fire>
    ^heaven’s red ire^  MS
And darkening as he gave it ear,
The still face of the sacred seer
Waxed wan with wrath & not with fear,
And ever changed its cloudier cheer
   Till all his face was very night.
‘This damosel that brought the sword,’
He said, ‘before the king my lord,
And all these knights about his board,
    Hath done them all despite.

532  ‘Till all his glance ^face^ was very night.  MS
533  ‘This damsel ^damosel^ here that brought the sword.’  MS
‘The falsest damosel she is
That works man ill on earth, I wis,
And all her mind is toward but this,
To kill as with a lying kiss
    Truth, & the life of noble trust.
A brother hath she, --see but now
The flame of shame that brands her brow!—
A true man, pure as faith's own vow,
    Whose honour knows not trust.
‘This good knight found within her bower
A felon & her paramour,
And slew him in his shameful hour,
As right gave might & righteous power
     To hands that wreaked so foul a wrong.
Then, for the hate her heart put on,
She sought by ways where death had gone
The lady Lyle of Avalon,
     Whose crafts are strange & strong.

547 <20> ^19^  MS
550 And slew him in <their> ^his^ shameful hour,  MS
552 To hands that wreaked so <vile> ^foul^ a wrong.  MS
553 Then, for the <…> hate her heart put on,  MS
‘The sorceress, one with her in thought,
Gave her that sword of magic, wrought
By charms whereof sweet heaven sees nought,
That hither girt on her she brought
   To be by doom her brother’s bane.
And grief it is to think how he
That won it, being of heart so free
And perfect found in chivalry,
   Shall by that sword lie slain.’
‘Great pity it is & strange despite
That one whose eyes are stars to light
Honour, & shine as heaven’s own height,
Should perish, being the goodliest knight
    That even the all-glorious north has borne.
Nor shall my lord the king behold
A lordlier friend of mightier mould
Than Balen, though his tale be told
    Ere noon fulfil his morn.’
IV.

1. As morning hears before it run
   The music of the mounting sun,
   And laughs to watch his trophies won
   From darkness, & her hosts undone,
   And all the night become a breath,
   Nor dreams that fear should hear & flee
   The summer menace of the sea,
   So hears our hope what life may be,
   And knows it not for death.
Each day that slays its hours & dies
Weeps, laughs, & lightens on our eyes,
And sees & hears not: smiles & signs
As flowers ephemeral fall & rise
   About its birth, about its way,
And pass as love & sorrow pass,
As shadows flashing down a glass,
As dew-flowers blowing in flowerless grass,
   As hope from yesterday.

589  <…> ^2^        MS
596  As shadows flashing <from> ^down^ a glass,  MS
597  As dew-flowers <gl…> blowing in flowerless grass,  MS
598  As <l…> hope from yesterday.  MS
The blossom of the sunny dew
That now the stronger sun strikes through
Fades off the blade whereon it blew
No fleetlier than the flowers that grew
   On hope’s green stem in life’s fierce light.
Nor might the glory soon to sit
Awhile on Balen’s crest alit
Outshine the shadow of doom on it
   Or stay death’s wings from flight.

605  Nor might the victory now glory soon to sit  MS
4.
Dawn on a golden moorland side
By holt & heath saw Balen ride
And Launceor after, pricked with pride
And stung with spurring envy: wide
   And far he had ridden athwart strange lands
And sought amiss the man he found
And cried on, till the stormy sound
Rang as a rallying trumpet round
   That fires men’s hearts & hands.

616  And cried <’called’> <’aloud’> on, till the ’stormy’ sound
Abide he bade him: nor was need
To bid when Balen wheeled his stead
Fiercely, less fain by word than deed
To bid his envier evil speed,
   And cried, ‘What wilt thou with me?’
Loud rang Launceor’s vehement answer: ‘Knight,
To avenge on thee the dire despite
Thou hast done us all in Arthur’s sight
   I stand toward Arthur vowed’.

620
625
628

5.

622 Fiercely, less <…> ^fain^ <of> ^with> ^by^ word than deed MS
625 ^Made^ ^Rang^ Launceor’s vehement answer: ‘Knight, MS
628 I <come as> ^stand^ toward Arthur vowed’. MS
628 I stand toward Arthur vowed[.’] C&W 1896
Ay? Balen said: albeit I see
I needs must deal in strife with thee,
Light is the wyte thou layest on me;
For her I slew & sinned not, she
    Was dire in all men’s eyes as death,
Or none were lother found than I
By me to bid a woman die:
As lief were loyal men to lie,
    Or scorn what honour saith’.

630  ‘Ay?’ Balen said: ‘<though well> ^albeit^ I see  MS
633  <So worse & more than death did she>
    ^For her I slew & sinned not, she^  MS
634  <I slew> Was dire in all men’s eyes as death,  MS
638  Or scorn what honour saith[.’]  C&W 1896
As the arched wave’s weight against the reef
Hurls, & is hurled back like a leaf
Storm-shrivelled, & its rage of grief
Speaks all the loud broad sea in brief,
    And quells the hearkening hearts of men,
Or as the crash of overfalls
Down under blue smooth water brawls
Like jarring steel on ruining walls,
    So rang their meeting then.
As wave on wave shocks, & confounds
The bounding bulk whereon it bounds
And breaks & shattering seaward sounds
As crying of the old sea’s wolves & hounds
    That moan & ravin & rage & wail,
So steed on steed encountering sheer Shocked, & the strength of Launceor’s spear
Shivered on Balen’s shield, & fear
    Bade hope within him quail.
But Balen’s spear through Launceor’s shield
Clove as a ploughshare cleaves the field
And pierced the hauberk triple-steeled,
That horse with horseman stricken reeled,
   And as a storm-breached rock falls, fell.
And Balen turned his horse again
And wist not yet his foe lay slain,
And saw him dead that sought his bane
   And wrought & fared not well.

And bade ^pierced^ the perished hauberk yield triple-steeled,

For vantage That horse with …horseman stricken reeled,

And as a shattering tower ^storm-breached rock^ falls, fell
Suddenly, while he gazed & stood,
And mused in many-minded mood
If life or death were evil or good,
Forth of a covert of a wood
That skirted half the moorland lea
Fast rode a maiden flower-like white
Full toward that fair wild place of fight,
Anhungered of the woful sight
God gave her there to see.
And seeing the man there fallen & dead, 680
She cried against the sun that shed Light on the living world, & said,
‘O Balen, slayer whose hand is red,
Two bodies & one heart thou hast slain,
Two hearts within one body: aye, 685
Two souls thou hast lost; by thee they die,
Cast out of sight of earth & sky
And all that made them fain.’
And from the dead his sword she caught,
And fell in trance that wist of nought,
Swooning: but softly Balen sought
To win from her the sword she thought
To die on, dying by Launceor’s side.
Again her wakening wail outbroke
As wildly, sword in hand, she woke
And struck one swift & bitter stroke
That healed her, & she died.
And sorrowing for their strange love’s sake
Rode Balen forth by lawn & lake,
By moor & moss & briar & brake,
And in his heart their sorrow spake
    Whose lips were dumb as death, & said
Mute words of presage blind & vain
As rain-stars blurred & marred by rain
To wanderers on a moonless main
    Where night & day seem dead.

706  As <starbeams>^rain-stars^ blurred & marred by rain  MS
Then toward a sunbright wildwood side
He looked & saw beneath it ride
A knight whose arms afar espied
By note of name & proof of pride
    Bare witness of his brother born,
His brother Balan, hard at hand,
Twin flower of bright Northumberland,
Twin sea-bird of their loud sea-strand,
    Twin song-bird of their morn.
Ah then from Balen passed away
All dread of night, all doubt of day,
All care what life or death might say,
All thought of all worse months than May:
Only the might of joy in love
Brake forth within him as a fire,
And deep delight in deep desire
Of deep far-flown days whose full-souled quire
Rang round from the air above.
From choral earth & quiring air
Rang memories winged like songs that bear
Sweet gifts for spirit & sense to share:
For no man’s life knows love more fair
   And fruitful of memorial things
Than this the deep dear love that breaks
With sense of life on life, & makes
The sundawn sunnier as it wakes
   Where morning round it rings.
17.
‘O brother, O my brother!’ cried
Each upon each, & cast aside
Their helms unbraced that might not hide
From sight of memory single-eyed
   The likeness graven of face & face,
And kissed & wept upon each other
For joy & pity of either brother,
And love engraffed by sire & mother,
   God’s natural gift of grace.

744  The likeness graven <^…^> of <^…^> ^face &^ face,  MS
747  <Being> ^And^ love <engraffed & of> <^engraffed from^> ^engraffed by^ sire & mother,  MS
478  <By gift of natural> ^God’s natural gift of^ grace.  MS
And each with each took counsel meet
For comfort, making sorrow sweet,
And grief a goodly thing to greet:
And word from word leapt light & fleet
    Till all the venturous tale was told,
And how in Balen’s hope it lay
To meet the wild Welsh king & slay,
    The grace he gave of old.
    And <told & heard> grief a goodly thing to greet:  MS
    Till all the venturous <told> tale was told,  MS
‘And thither wilt not thou with me and
And win as great a grace for thee?’
‘That will I well,’ quoth Balan: ‘we
Will cleave together, bound & free,
    As brethren should, being twain & one.’
But ere they parted thence there came
A creature withered as with flame,
A dwarf mismade in nature’s shame,
    Between them & the sun.
And riding fleet as fire may glide
He found the dead lie side by side,
And wailed & rent his hair & cried,
‘Who hath done this deed?’ And Balen eyed
The strange thing loathfully, & said,
‘The knight I slew, who found him fain
And keen to slay me: seeing him slain,
The maid I sought to save in vain,
Self-stricken, here lies dead.’
‘Sore grief was mine to see her die,
And for her true faith’s sake shall I
Love, & with love of heart more high,
All women better till I die.’

‘Alas,’ the dwarf said, ‘ill for thee
In evil hour this deed was done:
For now the quest shall be begun
Against thee, from the dawning sun
   Even to the sunset sea.

Love, & with love of heart more high,
‘From shore to mountain, dawn to night,
The kinsfolk of this great dead knight
Will chase thee to thy death.’ A light
Of swift blithe scorn flashed answer bright
As fire from Balen’s eye. ‘For that,
Small fear shall fret my heart,’ quoth he:
‘But that my lord the king should be
For this dead man’s sake wroth with me,
    Weep might it well thereat.’
Then murmuring passed the dwarf away,
And toward the knights in fair array
Came riding eastward up the way
From where the flower-soft lowlands lay
   A king whose name the sweet south-west
Held high in honour, & the land
That bowed beneath his gentle hand
Wore on its wild bright northern strand
   Tintagel for a crest.

805  Held high in honour, prince & chief & the land MS
806  King Mark That bowed beneath his gentle hand MS
And Balen hailed with homage due
King Mark of Cornwall, when he knew
The pennon that before him flew:
And for those lovers dead & true
   The king made moan to hear their doom;
And for their sorrow’s sake he sware
To seek in all the marches there
The church that man might find most fair
   And build therein their tomb.

819  <End of Fytte 4>  MS
As thought from thought takes wing & flies,
As month on month with sunlit eyes
Tramples & triumphs in its rise,
As wave smites wave to death & dies,
So chance on hurtling chance like steel
Strikes, flashes, & is quenched, ere fear
Can whisper hope, or hope can hear,
If sorrow or joy be far or near
    For time to hurt or heal.

823  As month on month with <gleaming> ^sunlit^ eyes  MS
Swift as a shadow & strange as light
That cleaves in twain the shadow of night
Before the wide-winged word take flight
That thunder speaks to depth & height
   And quells the quiet hour with sound,
There came before King Mark & stood
Between the moorside & the wood
The man whose word God’s will made good,
   Nor guile was in it found.

834  Before the <thunder’s> ^wide-winged^ word take flight  MS
834  Before the wide-winged word take[s] flight  C&W 1896
836  And quells the quiet <world> <sky> ^hour^ with sound,  MS
837  There came before <the king> ^King Mark^ & stood  MS
And Merlin said to Balen: ‘Lo,
Thou hast wrought thyself a grievous woe
To let this lady die, & know
Thou mightst have stayed her deadly blow.’

And Balen answered him & said,
‘Nay, by my truth to faith, not I,
So fiercely she was to die;
Ere well her sword had flashed on high,
    Self-slain she lay there dead.’

846  <Nay, sure> And Balen answered him & said

MS
Again & sadly Merlin spake:
‘My heart is wrung for this deed’s sake,
To know thee therefore doomed to take
Upon thine hand a curse, & make

Three kingdoms pine through twelve years’ change,

In want & woe: for thou shalt smite
The man most noble & truest knight
That looks upon the live world’s light

A dolorous stroke & strange.
‘And not till years shall round their goal
May this man’s wound thou hast given be whole.’
And Balen, stricken through the soul
By dark-winged words of doom & dole,
   Made answer: ‘If I wist it were
No lie but sooth thou sayest of me,
Then even to make a liar of thee
Would I too slay myself, & see
   How death bids dead men fare.’
And Merlin took his leave & passed
And was not: & the shadow as fast
Went with him that his word had cast;
Too fleet for thought thereof to last: 875

And there those brethren bade King Mark
Farewell: but fain would Mark have known
The strong knight’s name who had overthrown
The pride of Launcest, when it shone
    Bright as it now lay dark. 880

874 Went with him that his word had cast[.]
875 <Fleet as a fear> ^Too fleet for thought thereof to last:^
And Balan for his brother spake,
Saying; ‘Sir, albeit him list not break
The seal of secret time, nor shake
Night off him ere his morning wake,
    By these two swords he is girt withal
May men that praise him, knights & lords,
Call him the knight that bears two swords,
And all the praise his fame accords
    Make answer when they call.’
So parted they toward even tide;
And tender twilight, heavy-eyed,
Saw deep down glimmering woodlands ride
Balen & Balan side by side,
   Till where the leaves grew dense & dim
Again they spied from far draw near
The presence of the sacred seer,
But so disguised & strange of cheer
   That seeing they knew not him.

893  And tender twilight, <dewy> ^heavy^-eyed,   MS
896  <And> Till where the leaves grew dense & dim    MS
899  But so disguised <with> ^&^ strange<′s glee> ^of cheer^    MS
‘Now whither ride ye,’ Merlin said,
‘Through shadows that the sun strikes red,
Ere night be born or day be dead?’
But they, for doubt half touched with dread,
   Would say not where their goal might lie.
‘And thou,’ said Balen, ‘What art thou,
To walk with shrouded eye & brow?’
He said, ‘Me lists not show thee now
   By name what man am I.’

905 <And brief as...their answer sped>        MS
909 He said[: ] ‘Me lists not show thee now      C&W 1896
10.

‘Ill seen is this of thee,’ said they,
‘That thou art true in word & way
Nor fain to fear the face of day,
Who wilt not as a true man say

    The name it shames not him to bear.’

He answered: ‘Be it or be it not so,
Yet why ye ride this way I know,
To meet King Ryons as a foe,

    And how your hope shall fare.

---

913  ‘That thou art loyal just ^true^ in word & way       MS
914  W Nor fain to hear the fall of day,              MS
918  Yet why ye ride this way I know, <…>           MS
919  To meet with ^King^ Ryons as a foe, <…>       MS
11.
‘Well, if ye hearken toward my rede,
Ill, if ye hear not, shall ye speed.’
‘Ah, now,’ they cried, ‘thou art ours at need:
What Merlin saith we are fain to heed.’
‘Great worship shall ye win,’ said he,
‘And look that ye do knightly now,
For great shall be your need, I trow.’
And Balen smiled: ‘By knighthood’s vow,
The best we may will we.’

924 ‘Ah, <then> ^now^,’ they cried, <thry name we read>
^thou art ours at need^:  MS
Then Merlin bade them turn & take
Rest, for their good steeds’ weary sake,
Between the highway & the brake,
Till starry midnight bade them wake:

Then ‘Rise,’ he said, ‘the king is nigh,
Who hath stolen from all his host away
With threescore horse in armed array,
The goodliest knights that bear his sway
And hold his kingdom high.

| 937  | <And> ^Who^ hath <left his host> ^stolen from all his host away^ | MS |
| 938  | With <knights> threescore <knights> ^horse in armed^ array | MS |
| 939  | <And twenty ride of them before> ^The goodliest knights <he holds in> ^that^ bear his sway^ | MS |
| 940  | <To warn his …. lest her door close when> ^And hold his kingdom high.^ | MS |
And twenty ride of them before
To bear his errand, ere the door
Turn of the night, sealed fast no more,
And sundawn bid the stars wax hoar;
For by the starshine of tonight
He seeks a leman where she waits
His coming, dark & swift as fate’s,
And hearkens toward the unopening gates
    That yield not him to sight.’

944  Turn of the night, <that reigns> ^sealed fast^ no more,    MS
946  For by the sunshine of [to-night]    C&W 1896
947  He seeks a leman <that> where she waits    MS
949  And hearkens toward <her> the unopening gates    MS
Then through the glimmering gloom around
A shadowy sense of light & sound
Made, ere the proof thereof were found,
The brave blithe hearts within them bound,

And ‘Where’, quoth Balen, ‘rides the king?’
But softer spake the seer: ‘Abide,
Till hither toward your spears he ride
Where all the narrowing woodland side

Grows dense with boughs that cling’.

\[\text{952} \quad \text{Then through the glimmering gloom} \quad \text{there came} \quad \text{MS}\]
\[\text{953} \quad \text{Came ghostly} \quad \text{A shadowy sense of light & sound} \quad \text{MS}\]
\[\text{954} \quad \text{Made, ere the} \quad \text{proof thereof were found,} \quad \text{MS}\]
\[\text{956} \quad \text{And ‘Where[,] quoth Balen, ‘rides the king?’} \quad \text{C&W 1896}\]
\[\text{958} \quad \text{Till hither toward your spears he ride[,]} \quad \text{C&W 1896}\]
\[\text{960} \quad \text{Grows dense with boughs that cling[.]} \quad \text{C&W 1896}\]
There in that straitening way they met
The wild Welsh host against them set,
And smote their strong king down, ere yet
His hurrying horde of spears might get
    Fierce vantage of them. Then the fight
Grew great & joyous as it grew,
For left & right those brethren slew,
Till all the lawn waxed red with dew
    More deep than dews of night.

969  Till all the lawn <was> ^waxed^ red with dew  MS
970  More <dense> ^deep^ than dews of night.  MS
And ere the full fierce tale was read,
Full forty lay before them dead,
And fast the hurtling remnant fled
And wist not whither fear had led:
And toward the king they went again,
And would have slain him: but he bowed
Before them, crying in fear aloud
For grace they gave him, seeing the proud
Wild king brought lowest of men.

972  And ere the ^full fierce^ was <fully> read,       MS
972  And ere the full fierce was read[<,>]       C&W 1896
979  For grace <& mercy> they gave him, seeing the proud       MS
And ere the wildwood leaves were stirred
With song or wing of wakening bird,
In Camelot was Merlin’s word
With joy in joyous wonder heard
    That told of Arthur’s bitterest foe
Diskingdomed and discomfited.
‘By whom?’ the high king smiled & said.
He answered: ‘Ere the dawn wax red,
    To-morrow bids you know.’

982  <And ere they bound them thence to fare>
    ^And ere the wildwood leaves were stirred^     MS
985  <With joy<ful>^ous^ ...afield the happy battle>
    ^With joy in joyous wonder^ heard     MS
987  <Stricken. ‘By whom?’ King Arthur said.>
    ^Diskingdomed & discomfited.^     MS
988  <‘Tomorrow shall that rede be read>
    ^‘By whom?’ the high king smiled & said.^     MS
989  <When> <The seer made answer>
    ^He answered: ‘Ere the dawn wax red.^     MS
990  To-morrow <shall> ^bids^ you know.’     MS
‘Two knights whose heart & hope are one
And fain to win your grace have done
This work whereby if grace be won
Their hearts shall hail the enkindling sun
    With joy more keen & deep than day.’
And ere the sundawn drank the dew
These brethren with their prisoner drew
To the outer guard they gave him to
    And passed again away.
And Arthur came as toward his quest
To greet his foe, & bade him rest
As one returned from nobler quest
And welcome from the stormbright west,
   But by what chance he fain would hear.
‘The chance was hard & strange, sir king,’
Quoth Ryons, bowed in thanksgiving.
‘Who won you?’ Arthur said: ‘the thing
   Is worth a warrior’s ear’.

1004  As one <made welcome> returned from nobler quest  MS
1007  ‘<My> ^The^ chance was hard & strange, sir king.’  MS
1010  Is worth a warrior’s ear[.‘]  C&W 1896
The wild king flushed with pride & shame,
Answering: ‘I know not either name
Of those that there against us came
And withered all our strength like flame:
   The knight that bears two swords is one,
And one his brother: not on earth
May men meet men of knightlier worth
Nor mightier born of mortal birth
   That hail the sovereign sun’.

1014  Of those that hard ^there^ against us came    MS
1015  And wash^wither^ed all our strength like flame:    MS
1018  May men meet men of lord^knight^lier worth    MS
1019  Nor mightier braver ^mightier^ born of mortal birth    MS
1020  That hail the sovereign sun[.]    C&W 1896
But Arthur wist not who they were
Who had \textit{done} such \textit{duty} toward him there
Where hardly might his liegeman fare
And face not death too dire to dare
\textit{At hands of wild men} \textit{From hands that fought as hell may fight.}
And Merlin \textit{sighing … witness: Lord,} \textit{spake}
\textit{Balen, is one} that won the spell-bound sword.\footnote{Swinburne struck out this entire drafted stanza in the manuscript.}
And Arthur said: “I know them not;
But much am I for this, God wot,
Beholden to them: Launcelot
Nor Tristram, when the war waxed hot
    Along the marches east & west,
Wrought ever nobler work than this.’
‘Ah,’ Merlin said, ‘sore pity it is
And strange mischance of doom, I wis,
    That death should mar their quest.

1027  <Gave> ^Wrought^ ever nobler work <for me^ ^than this^.’ MS
‘Balen, the perfect knight that won
The sword whose name is malison,
And made his deed his doom, is one:
Nor hath his brother Balan done

Less royal service: not on earth
Lives there a nobler knight, more strong
Of soul to win men’s praise in song,
Albeit the light abide not long

That lightened round his birth.
Yea, & of all sad things I know
The heaviest & the highest in woe
Is this, the doom whose date brings low
Too soon in timeless overthrow
A head so high, a hope so sure.
The greatest moan for any knight
That ever won fair fame in fight
Shall be for Balen, seeing his might
Must now not long endure.'
‘Alas,’ King Arthur said, ‘he hath shown
Such love to me-ward that the moan
Made of him should be mine alone
Above all other, knowing it known
I have ill deserved it of him’. ‘Nay,‘
Said Merlin, ‘he shall do for you
Much more, when time shall be anew,
Than time hath given him chance to do
Or hope may think to say.

1055  Above all other, <see>^know^ing it known  MS
1056  I have ill deserved it of him[,''] ‘Nay,’  C&W 1896
‘But now must be your powers purveyed
To meet, ere noon of morn be made
To-morrow, all the host arrayed
Of this wild foe’s wild brother, laid

    Around against you: see to it well,
For now I part from you.’ And soon,
When sundawn slew the withering moon,
Two hosts were met to win the boon

    Whose tale is death’s to tell.
A lordly tale of knights & lords
For death to tell by count of swords
When war’s wild harp in all its chords
Rang royal triumph, & the hordes
   Of hurtling foemen rocked & reeled
As waves wind-thwarted on the sea,
Was told of all that there might be Till scarce might battle hear or see
   The fortune of the field.
And many a knight won fame that day
When even the serpent soul of Kay
Was kindled toward the fiery play
As might a lion’s be for prey,
And won him fame that might not die
With passing of his rancorous breath
But clung about his life & death
As fire that speaks in cloud, & saith
What strong men hear & fly.

1084  Was kindled toward [<toward>] the fiery play  C&W 1896
1085  As might a lion’s, <fain of> <^yearn for^> <fray> be for prey  MS
1090  <What cloud> <That might & light are nigh.>
     ^What strong men hear & fly.  MS
And glorious works were Arthur’s there,
That lit the battle-darkened air:
But when they saw before them fare
Like stars of storm the knight that bare
Two swords about him girt for fray,
Balen, & Balan with him, then
Strong wonder smote the souls of men
If heaven’s own host or hell’s deep den
    Had sent them forth to slay.

1095

1096 Two swords about him girt for fight ^fray^, MS
1097 And Balen, & Balan with him, then MS
1099 If heaven’s high dome ^own host^ or hell’s deep den MS
So keen they rode across the fight,
So sharp they smote to left & right,
And made of hurtling darkness light
With lightning of their swords, till flight
  And fear before them flew like flame,
That Arthur’s self had never known,
He said, since first his blast was blown,
Such lords of war as these alone
  That whence be knew not came.

1103 So <sore> ^sharp^ they smote to left & right,  MS
1105 With lightning of <…> their swords, till flight  MS
1106 And fear before them flew like <fire> ^flame^,  MS
But while the fire of war waxed hot
The wild king hearkened, hearing not,
Through storm of spears & arrow-shot,
For succour toward him from King Lot
    And all his host of sea-born men,
Strong as the strong storm-baffling bird
Whose cry round Orkney’s headlands heard
Is as the sea’s own sovereign word
    That mocks our mortal ken.
For Merlin's craft of prophecy,
Who wist that one of twain must die,
Put might in him to say thereby
Which head should lose its crown, & lie
Stricken, tho loth he were to know
That either life shd wane & fail;
Yet most might Arthur's love avail,
And still with subtly tempered tale
    His wile held fast the foe.
32
With woven words of magic might
Wherein the subtle shadow & light
Changed hope & fear till fear took flight,
He stayed King Lot’s fierce lust of fight
   Till all the wild Welsh war was driven
As foam before the wind that wakes
With the all-awakening sun, & breaks
Strong ships that rue the mirth it makes
   When grace to slay is given.

1132  With woven words of <prophecy> magic might     MS
1133  <He <bound> ^charmed^ King Lot’s fierce lust of fight>     MS
1133  <Till all the wild Welsh war was driven>     MS
1133  ^Wherein the subtle shadow & light^     MS
And ever hotter lit & higher,
As fire that meets encountering fire,
Waxed in King Lot his keen desire
To bid revenge within him tire
    On Arthur’s ravaged fame & life:
Across the waves of war between
Floated & flashed, unseen & seen,
The lustrous likeness of the queen
    Whom shame had sealed his wife.

1142  And ever hotter <waxed> ^lit^ & higher,          MS
1147  Across the <spears> waves of war between          MS
But when the woful word was brought
That while he tarried, doubting nought,
The hope was lost whose goal he sought
And all the fight he yearned for fought,
   His heart was rent for grief & shame,
And half his hope was set on flight
Till word was given him of a knight
Who said, ‘They are weary & worn with fight,
   And we more fresh than flame’.

1052  But when the woful word was said brought  MS
1055  And all the fight he looked yearned for fought,  MS
1057  And wot not if to yield or fight,^half his hope was set on fight^  MS
1059  Who said[:] ‘They are weary & worn with fight,  C&W 1896
1060  And we more fresh than flame[.‘]  C&W 1896
35
And bright & dark as night & day
Ere either find the unopening way
Clear, & forego the unfaltering sway,
The sad king's face shone, frowning: 'Yea,  1165
   I would that every knight of mine
Would do his part as I shall do,'
He said, 'till death or life anew
Shall judge between us as is due
   With wiser doom than thine.'  1170

1162  <Then> ^And^ bright & dark as night & day  MS
Then thundered all the awakening field
With crash of host that clashed & reeled,
Banner to banner, shield to shield,
And spear to splintering spear-shaft, steeled
As heart against high heart of man,
As hope against high hope of knight
To pluck the crest & crown of fight
From war’s clenched hand by storm’s wild light,
For blessing given or ban.

1177  <And> ^As^ hope against high hope of knight   MS
1179  From war’s clenched hand <of judgment, bright.>
  ^of doom^ ^whose doom shd write^>
  ^of judgment tho death shd stride^ ^of doom^
  ^by storm’s wild light^     MS
1180  <With> ^For^ blessing <born of> ^given or^ ban.   MS
All hearts of hearkening men that heard
The ban twin-born with blessing, stirred
Like springtide waters, knew the word
Whereby the steeds of storm are spurred
  With ravenous rapture to destroy,
And laughed for love of battle, pierced
With passion of tempestuous thirst
And hungering hope to assuage it first
  With draughts of stormy joy.

1184 Like <stormy> ⌈springtide⌉ waters, knew the word
1185 Where<with> ⌈by⌉ the steeds of storm are <spared> ⌈spurred⌉

MS
But sheer ahead of the iron tide
That rocked & roared from side to side
Rode as the lightning’s lord might ride
King Lot, whose heart was set to abide
All peril of the raging hour,
And all his host of warriors born
Where lands by warring seas are worn
Was only by his hands upborne
Who gave them pride & power.
But as the sea’s hand smites the shore
And shatters all the strengths that bore
The ravage earth may bear no more,
So smote the hand of Pellinore

Charging, a knight of Arthur’s chief,
And clove his strong steed’s neck in twain,
And smote him sheer thro’ brow & brain,
Falling: & there King Leo lay slain,
And knew not wrath or grief.
And all the host of Orkney fled,
And many a mother’s son lay dead:
But when they raised the stricken head
Whence pride & power & shame were fled
And rage & anguish now cast out,
And bore it toward a kingly tomb,
The wife whose love had wrought his doom
Came thither, fair as mornings’ bloom
And dark as twilight’s doubt.

1217  And bore it toward a <royal> kingly tomb,  MS
1219  <And turned his light of life to gloom>
       ^Came thither, fair as mornings’ bloom^  MS
1219  Came thither, fair as morning[^s] bloom  C&W 1896
And there her four strong sons & his,
Gawain & Gareth, Gaherys
And Agravain, whose sword’s sharp kiss
With sound of hell’s own serpent’s hiss
    Should one day turn her life to death,
Stood mourning with her: but by these
Seeing Mordred as a seer that sees,
Anguish of terror bent her knees
    And caught her shuddering breath.

1225  <Should after smite her dead>
    ^With sound of hell’s own serpent’s hiss^  MS
1228  << ^Came^>When Arthur’s son & hers>
    ^Mordred smiled & scowled at ease,>
    ^Seeing Mordred as a seer that sees,^  MS
The splendour of her sovereign eyes
Flashed darkness deeper than the skies
Feel or fear when the sunset dies
On his that felt as midnight rise
    Their doom upon them, there undone
By faith in fear ere thought could yield
A shadowy sense of days revealed,
The ravin of the final field,
    The terror of their son.
For Arthur’s, as they caught the light
That sought & durst not seek his sight,
Darkened, & all his spirit’s might
Withered within him even as night
  Withers when sunrise thrills the sea.
But Mordred’s lightened as with fire
That smote his mother & his sire
With darkling doom & deep desire
  That bade its darkness be.
And heavier on their hearts the weight
Sank of the fear that brings forth fate,
The bitter doubt whose womb is great
With all the grief & love & hate
    That turn to fire men’s days on earth.
And glorious was the funeral made,
And dark the deepening dread that swayed
Their darkening souls whose light grew shade
    With sense of death in birth.

1256  That turn to fire men’s days <& nights> ^on earth.^  MS
1258  And dark the deepening dread that <stayed> <^weighed^> ^swayed^  MS
1259  <The sorrow chilled in souls afraid>
    ^Their darkening souls whose light grew shade^  MS
1260  <That know not> ^With sense of^ death <from> ^in^ birth.  MS
VI.
1
In autumn, when the wind & sea
Rejoice to live & laugh to be,
And scarce the blast that curbs the tree And bids before it quail & flee
The fiery foliage, where its brand
Is radiant as the seal of spring,
Sounds less delight, & waves a wing
Less lustrous, life’s loud thanksgiving
Puts life in sea & land.

1261 [VI] C&W 1896
1263 [IN] autumn, when the wind & sea C&W 1896
1266 And bids <his leaves> before it quail & flee MS
1268 <Burns> ^Is^ radiant as the <smiles> ^seal^ of spring. MS
High hope in Balen’s heart alight
Laughed, as from all that clamorous fight
He passed & sought not Arthur’s sight,
Who fain had found his kingliest knight
    And made amend for Balen’s wrong.
But Merlin gave his soul to see
Fate, rising as a shoreward sea,
And all the sorrow that should be
    Ere hope or fear thought long.

1277  And <shown …> made amend for Balen’s wrong.  MS
1278  But Merlin<’s … gave his hope to> <^bade the^> ^gave his soul to^ see  MS
‘O where are they whose hands upbore
My battle,’ Arthur said, ‘before
The wild Welsh host’s wide rage & roar?
Balen & Balan, Pellinore,
   Where are they?’ Merlin answered him,
‘Balen shall be not long away
From sight of you, but night nor day
Shall bring his brother back to say
   If life burn bright or dim’.

1284  My battle <…>,’ Arthur said, ‘before  MS
1285  The <hurling host> wild Welsh <Lots> ^host’s^ wide rage & roar?  MS
1287  Where are they?’ Merlin answered him[:]  C&W 1896
1288  ‘Balen shall be not <from you> long away  MS
1291  If life burn bright or dim[.]’  C&W 1896
‘Now, by my faith’, said Arthur then.
‘Two marvellous knights are they, whose ken
Toward battle makes the twain as ten,
And Balen most of all born men
Passeth of prowess all I know
Or ever found or sought to see:
Would God he would abide with me,
To face the times foretold of thee
And all the latter woe’.

1293  ‘Now, by my faith[,’] said Arthur then,
1298  Or ever found <at need in fight> ^or sought to see:^
1301  And all the latter woe[,’]
For there had Merlin shown the king
The doom that songs unborn shd sing,
The gifts that time shd rise & bring     1305
Of blithe & bitter days to spring
                           As weeds & flowers against the sun.
And on the king for fear’s sake fell
Sickness, & sorrow deep as hell,
Nor even might sleep bid fear farewell
                           If grace to sleep were won.     1310
Down in a meadow green & still
He bade the folk that wrought his will
Pitch his pavilion, where the chill
Soft night would let not rest fulfil
    A heart wherein dark fears lay deep.
And sharp against his hearing cast
Came a sound of horsehoofs fast
Passing, that ere their sound were past
    Aroused him as from sleep.

1313 <Deep> ^Down^ in a meadow green & still 1315 Pitch his pavilion, where <but ill> the chill
1316 <He slept, & might> ^Soft night would let^ not ^sleep his fill^ ^rest^ fulfil
1317 <His heavy> ^A^ heart <with peace & rest.>
    ^wherein dark fears lay deep.^
1317 [His] heart wherein dark fears lay deep.  C&W 1896
1319 Came <^Rang^> a sound of <one riding> ^horsehoofs^ fast
1320 <Whose horse> Passing, that ere their sound were past
And forth he looked along the grass
And saw before his portal pass
A knight that wailed aloud, ‘Alas
That life should find this dolorous pass
    And find no shield from doom & dole!’
And hearing all his moan, ‘Slide,
Fair sir,’ the king arose & cried,
And say what sorrow bids you ride
    So sorrowful of soul.’

1323 And <past the portal> forth he looked along the <…> grass MS
1325 A knight that <made great moan> ^wailed aloud, ‘Alas^ MS
1327 And find no <cease> <^rest^> ^shield^ from doom & dole!’ MS
1330 And <tell … me wherefore a knight may ride>
    ^say what burden bids you^ <^tell me wherefore thus^> ^say what sorrow bids you ride^ MS
1331 <So sore & sick in soul> <^So sore abased^>
    <^As one so grieved^> ^So sorrowful of soul.^ MS
My hurt may no man heal, God wot,
And help of man may speed me not,
The sad knight said, ‘nor change my lot.’

And toward the castle of Melyot
  Whose towers arose a league away
He passed forth sorrowing: & anon,
Ere well the woful sight were gone,
Came Balen down the meads that shone,
  Strong, bright, & brave as day.
And seeing the king there stand, the knight
Drew rein before his face to alight
In reverence made for love’s sake bright
With joy that set his face alight
    As theirs who see, alive, above,
The sovereign of their souls, whose name
To them is even as love’s own flame
To enkindle hope that heeds not fame
    And knows no lord but love.

1344  <Was swift> <Made speed> ^Drew rein^
      <with reverent joy> ^before his face^ to alight  MS
1345  <In> <With> ^In^ reverence made for love’s sake bright  MS
1347  As theirs who see, <their chief of men,> ^alive, above^  MS
And Arthur smiled on him, & said,
‘Right welcome be thou: by my head,
I would not wish me better sped.
For even but now there came & fled
   Before me like a cloud that flies
A knight that made most heavy cheer,
I know not wherefore; now may fear
Or pity give my heart to hear
   Or lighten on mine eyes.

1355 I would ^not^ wish me better sped.  MS
1358 A knight that <…> made <great moan> ^most heavy cheer^ MS
‘But even for fear’s & pity’s sake
Fain were I thou shouldst overtake
And fetch again this knight that spake
No word of answering grace to make
   Reply to mine that hailed him: thou,
By force or by goodwill, shalt bring
His face before me’. ‘Yea, my king,’
Quoth Balen, ‘& a greater thing
   Were less than is my vow.

1365  And <bring> ^fetch^ again this knight that spake  MS
1366  No word <& drew not ... > ^of answering grace^ to make  MS
1368  By force <...> or by goodwill, shalt bring  MS
1369  His face before me[. ‘Yea, my king,’  C&W 1896
‘I would the task required & heard
Were heavier than your sovereign word
Hath laid upon me’: & hence he spurred
Elate at heart as youth, & stirred
    With hope as blithe as fires a boy:
And many a mile he rode, & found
Far in a forest’s glimmering bound
The man he sought afar around
    And seeing took fire for joy.
And with him went a maiden, fair
As flowers aflush with April air.
And Balen bade him turn him there
To tell the king what woes they were
That bowed him down so sore: & he Made woful answer: ‘This should do
Great scathe to me, with nought for you
Of help that hope might hearken to
For boot that may not be.’

1389  Great scathe to me, & nought to & with & break for^>^nought for^> you  MS
1390  O^>^No^> help that hope might hear ken to  MS
And Balen answered: ‘I were loth
To fight as one perforce made wroth
With one that owes by knighthood’s oath
One love, one service, & one troth
   With me to him whose gracious hand
Holds fast the helm of knighthood here
Whereby man’s hope & heart man steer:
I pray you let not sorrow or fear
   Against his bidding stand.’
The strange knight gazed on him, & spake:
‘Will you, for Arthur’s royal sake,
Be warrant for me that I take
No scathe from strife that man may make?
Then will I go with you.’ And he Made joyous answer: ‘Yea, for I
Will be your warrant or will die’.
And thence they rode with hearts as high
As men’s that search the sea.
And as by noon’s large light the twain
Before the tented hall drew rein
Suddenly fell the strange knight, slain
By one that came & went again
    And none might see him; but his spear
Clove through the body, swift as fire,
The man whose doom, forefelt as dire,
Had darkened all his life’s desire,
    As one that death held dear.

1414  Before the high royal place ^tented hall^ drew rein    MS
1414  Before the tented hall drew rein[,]    C&W 1896
And dying he turned his face & said,
‘Lo now thy warrant that my head
Should fall not, following forth where led
A knight whose pledge hath left me dead.
    This darkling manslayer hath to name
Garlon: take thou my goodlier steed,
Seeing thine is less of strength & speed,
And ride, if thou be knight indeed,
    Even thither whence we came.
‘And as the maiden’s fair behest
Shall bid you follow on my quest,
Follow: & when God’s will sees best,
Revenge my death, & let me rest
   As one that lived & died a knight,
Unstained of shame alive or dead’.
And Balen, wrung with sorrow, said,
‘That shall I do: my hand & head
   I pledge to do you right.’

1434  Shall <lead> ^bid^ you follow on my quest,       MS
1438  Unstained of shame alive or dead[.’]           C&W 1896
1440  ‘That shall I do: <by hand & head> ^my hand & head^        MS
1441  <I am pledged> ^I pledge^ to do you right.’        MS
And thence with sorrowing heart & cheer
He rode, in grief that cast out fear
Lest death in darkness yet were near,
And bore the truncheon of the spear
  Wherewith the woful knight lay slain
To her with whom he rode, & she Still bear it with her, fain to see
What righteous doom of God’s might be
  The darkling manslayer’s bane.

1443  And ^thence with^ sorrowing <thence he rode, & found> heart & cheer         MS
1444  <The maiden> He rode, in grief that cast out fear       MS
1445  <Or wonder> Lest death in darkness yet <rode> ^were^ near.      MS
1448  <Back> To her with whom he rode, & she                MS
And down a dim deep woodland way
They rode between the boughs asway
With flickering winds whose flash & play
Made sunlight sunnier where the day
    Laughed, leapt, & fluttered like a bird
Caught in a light loose leafy net
That earth for amorous heaven had set
To hold & see the sundawn yet
    And hear what morning heard.

1453 And down a <dark> dim^ deep woodland way
1455 With <flashing> ^flickering^ winds whose <sunny> ^flash^ & play
1460 To hold & see <fal...> the <m...> sundawn yet
There in the sweet soft shifting light
Across their passage rode a knight
Flushed hot from hunting as from flight,
And seeing the sorrow-stricken sight
    Made question of them why they rode
As mourners, sick at heart & sad,
When all alive about them bade
Sweet earth for heaven’s sweet sake be glad
    As heaven for earth’s love glowed.
‘Me list not tell you,’ Balen said.
The strange knight’s face grew keen & red;
‘Now, might my hand but keep my head,
Even here should one of twain lie dead
   Were he no better armed than I.’
And Balen spake with smiling speed,
Where scorn & courtesy kept heed
Of either: ‘That should little need:
   Not here shall either die.’

1473  ‘Me list[s] not tell you,’ Balen said.  C&W 1896
1475  <And> ‘Now, might my hand but keep <…> ^my^ head,  MS
And all the cause he told him through
As one that feared not though he knew
All: & the strange knight spake anew,
Saying, ‘I will part no more from you
While life shall last me.’ So they went
Where he might arm himself to ride,
And rode across wild ways & wide
To where against a churchyard side
   A hermit’s harbour leant.

1486  Saying[:] ‘I will part no more from you  C&W 1896
And there against them riding came
Fleet as the lightning’s laugh & flame
The invisible evil, even the same
They sought & might not curse by name
As hell’s foul child on earth set free,
And smote the strange knight through, & fled,
And left the mourners by the dead.
‘Alas, again,’ Sir Balen said,
‘This wrong he hath done to me’.

1494 Fleet as the lightning’s <fear> laugh & flame  MS
1501 ‘This wrong he hath done to me[.]’  C&W 1896
And there they laid their dead to sleep
Royally, lying where wild winds keep
Keen watch & wail more soft & deep
Than where men’s choirs bid music weep
   And song like incense heave & swell.
And forth again they rode, & found
Before them, dire in sight & sound,
A castle girt about & bound
   With sorrow like a spell.

1505

1510  A castle girt <with fear around> about & bound  MS
Above it seemed the sun at noon
Sad as a wintry withering moon
That shudders while the waste wind’s tune
Craves ever none may guess what boon,

But all may know the boon for dire.

And evening on its darkness fell
More dark than very death’s farewell,

And night about it hung like hell,

Whose fume the dawn made fire.
And Balen lighted down & passed
Within the gateway, whence no blast
Rang as the sheer portcullis, cast
Suddenly down, fell, & made fast
    The gate behind him, whence he spied
A sudden rage of men without
And ravin of a murderous rout
That girt the maiden hard about
    With death on either side.

1530  That girt the maiden <fall> ^hard^ about
1531  <To slay her here beside> ^With death on either side.^
And seeing that shame & peril, fear
Bade wrath & grief awake & hear
What shame should say in fame’s wide ear
If she, by sorrow sealed more dear
Than joy might make her, so should die:
And up the tower’s curled stair he sprang
As one that flies death’s deadliest fang,
And leapt right out amid their gang
As fire from heaven on high.
And they thereunder seeing the knight
Unhurt among their press alight
And bare his sword for chance of fight
Stood from him, loth to strive or smite,
And bade him hear their woful word,
That not the maiden’s death they sought;
But there through years too dire for thought
Had lain their lady stricken, & nought
   Might heal her: & he heard.

1542  <31> 29                      MS
1545  And bare his sword for <shieldless> ^chance of^ fight  MS 1546  <Would strive not with> ^Stood from him, loth to strive or smite.^                      MS
1547  And bade him hear their ^woful^ word, <& head>  MS
1549  But there through years too <sad> ^dire^ for thought  MS
For there a maiden clean & whole
In virgin body & virgin soul,
Whose name was writ on royal roll,
That would but stain a silver bowl
With offering of her stainless blood,
Therewith might heal her: so they stayed
For hope’s sad sake each blameless maid
There journeying in that dolorous shade
Whose bloom was bright in bud.
No hurt nor harm to her it were
If she should yield a sister there
Some tribute of her blood, & fare
Forth with this joy at heart to bear,
That all unhurt & unafraid
This grace she had here by God’s grace wrought.
And kindling all with kindly thought
And love that saw save love’s self nought,
    Shone, smiled, & spake the maid.
‘Good knight of mine, good will have I
To help this healing though I die’.

‘Nay,’ Balen said, ‘but love may try
What help in living love may lie.

--I will not lose the life of her
While my life lasteth’. So she gave
The tribute love was fain to crave,
But might not heal though fain to save,

Were God’s grace helpfuller.
Another maid in later Mays
Won with her life that woful praise,
And died. But they, when surging day’s
Deep tide fulfilled the dawn’s wide ways,
   Rode forth, & found by day or night
No chance to cross their wayfaring
Till when they saw the fourth day spring
A knight’s hall gave them harbouring
   Rich as a king’s house might.
And while they sat at meat & spake
Words bright & kind as grace might make
Sweet for true knighthood’s kindly sake,
They heard a cry beside them break
The still-souled joy of blameless rest.
‘What noise is this?’ quoth Balen, ‘Nay,’
His knightly host made answer, ‘may
Our grief not grieve you though I say
How here I dwell unblest.

1595 <For love’s sake gracious,> Sweet for true knighthood’s kindly sake,                             MS
1596 They heard a cry beside them <wake> break                           MS
1597 The <quest> ^still-souled^ joy of blameless rest.                    MS
1600 Our grief not <…> grieve you though I say                          MS 35
‘Not many a day has lived & died
Since at a tournay late I tried
My strength to smite & turn & ride
Against a knight of kinglike pride,
    King Pellam’s brother: twice I smote
The splendour of his strength to dust:
And he, fulfilled of hate’s fierce lust,
Swore vengeance, pledged for hell to trust,
    And keen as hell’s wide throat.
‘Invisible as the spirit of night
That heaven & earth in depth & height
May see not by the mild moon’s light
Nor even when stars would grant them sight,
   He walks & slays as plague’s blind breath
Slays: & my son, whose anguish here
Makes moan perforce that mars our cheer,
He wounded, even ere love might fear
   That hate were strong as death.
‘Nor may my son be whole till he
Whose stroke through him hath stricken me
Shall give again his blood to be
Our healing: yet may no man see
This felon, clothed with darkness round
And keen as lightning’s life.’ Thereon
Spake Balen, & his presence shone
Even as the sun’s when stars are gone
That hear dawn’s trumpet sound.
‘That knight I know: two knights of mine,
Two comrades, sealed by faith’s bright sign,
Whose eyes as ours that live should shine,
And drink the golden sunlight’s wine
       With joy’s thanksgiving that they live,
He hath slain in even the same blind wise:
Were all wide wealth beneath the skies
Mine, might I meet him, eyes on eyes,
       All would I laugh to give’.

1641  All would I <gladly> ^laugh to^ give’.           MS
1641  All would I laugh to give[.]’                   C&W 1896
His host made answer, & his gaze
Grew bright with trust as dawn’s moist maze
With fire: ‘Within these twenty days,
King Pellam, lord of Lystenayse,
     Holds feast through all this country cried,
And there before the knightly king
May no knight come except he bring
For witness of his warfaring
     His paramour or bride.
‘And there that day, so soon to shine,
This knight, your felon foe & mine,
Shall shew, full-flushed with bloodred wine,
The fierce false face whereon we pine
To wreak the wrong he hath wrought us, bare
As shame should see & brand it.’ ‘Then’,
Said Balen, ‘shall he give again
His blood to heal your son, & men
Shall see death blind him there.’

1653 ‘And there that day, when swordblades ^so soon to^ shine,
1654 That ^This^ knight, your felon foe & mine, 1655 Shall shew, … feast, across the ^full-flushed with bloodred^ wine,
1655 Shall [show], full-flushed with bloodred wine,
1658 As shame would ^should^ see … ^&^ brand it.’
‘Then’,
1658 As shame should see & brand it.’ ‘Then[,’
1660 His blood to heal your son, that ^&^ men
1661 Unhurt of spells shall fare.
^Shall see death blind him there.^
‘Forth will we fare to-morrow,’ said
His host: & forth, as sunrise led,
They rode; & fifteen days were fled
Ere toward their goal their steeds had sped.
   And there alighting might they find
For Balen’s host no place to rest,
Who came without a gentler guest
Beside him: & that household’s hest
   Bade leave his sword behind.
Nay,' Balen said, ‘that do I not:
My country’s custom stands, God wot,
That none whose lot is knighthood’s lot, 1675
To ride where chance as fire is hot
With hope or promise given of fight,
Shall fail to keep, for knighthood’s part,
His weapon with him as his heart:
And as I came will I depart, 1680
Or hold herein my right.’
Then gat he leave to wear his sword
Beside the strange king’s festal board
Where feasted many a knight & lord
In seamliness of fair accord:
   And Balen asked of one beside,
   ‘Is there not in this court, if fame
Keep faith, a knight that hath to name
Garlon?’ & saying that word of shame,
   He scanned that place of pride.’
‘Yonder he goeth against the light,
He with the face as swart as night,’
Quoth the other: ‘but he rides to fight
Hid round by charms from all men’s sight,
   And many a noble knight he hath slain,
Being wrapt in darkness deep as hell
And silence dark as shame.’ ‘Ah, well,’
Said Balen, ‘is that he? the spell
   May be the sorcerer’s bane’.

1693 ‘Yonder ^he^ goeth against the light.<’>
1694 <Said the other> He with the face as swart as might,’
1696 Hid round <with spells> ^by charms^ from all men’s sight,
1701 May be the sorcerer’s bane[.‘]

C&W 1896
Then Balen gazed upon him long,
And thought, “If here I wreak my wrong,
Alive I may not scape, so strong
The felon’s friends about him throng;
And if I leave him here alive,
This chance perchance may life not give
Again: much evil, if he live,
He needs must do, should fear forgive
    When wrongs bid strike & strive.”
And Garlon, seeing how Balen’s eye
Dwell on him as his heart waxed high
With joy in wrath to see him nigh,
Rose wolf-like with a wolfish cry
    And crossed & smote him on the face,
Saying, ‘Knight, what wouldst thou with me? Eat,
For shame, & gaze not: eat thy meat:
Do that thou art come for: stands thy seat
    Next ours of royal race?’

1718  Saying, ‘Knight, what wouldst thou ^with^ me? Eat,  MS
1720  Do that thou art come for: <us> ^stands^ thy seat  MS
'Well hast thou said: they rede rings true; That which I came for will I do,' Quoth Balen: forth his fleet sword flew, And clove the head of Garlon through Clean to the shoulders. Then he cried Loud to his lady, 'Give me here The truncheon of the shameful spear Wherewith he slew your knight, when fear Bade hate in darkness ride.'
And gladly, bright with grief made glad,
She gave the truncheon as he bade,
For still she bare it with her, sad
And strong in hopeless hope she had,
Thro all dark days of thwarting fear,
To see if doom should fall aright
And as God’s fire-fraught thunder smite
That head, clothed round with hell-faced night,
Bare now before her here.

1734 She gave the truncheon as <she> he bade,        MS
1737 <For> ^Thro^ all dark days of thwarting fear,        MS
1737 [Through] all dark days of thwarting fear,        C&W 1896
And Balen smote therewith the dead
Dark felon’s body through, & said
Aloud, ‘With even this truncheon, red
With baser blood than brave men bled
Whom in thy shameful hand it slew,
Thou hast slain a nobler knight, & now
It clings & cleaves thy body: thou
Shalt cleave again no brave man’s brow,
   Though hell would aid anew.’

1749  It ^clings &^ cleaves <within> thy body: thou     MS
1750  [Shall] cleave again no brave man’s brow,   C&W 1896
And toward his host he turned & spake;
‘Now for your son’s long-suffering sake
Blood ye may fetch enough, & take
Wherewith to heal his hurt, & make
Death warm as life.’ Then rose a cry
Loud as the wind’s when stormy spring
Makes all the woodland rage & ring:
‘Thou hast slain my brother’, said the king,
‘And here with him shalt die’.

1757  Death warm <^bright^> as life.’ Then rose a cry  MS
1760  Thou hast slain my brother[,’] said the king,  C&W 1896
1761  ‘And here with him shalt die[,’]  C&W 1896
‘Ay?’ Balen laughèd him answer. ‘Well, Do it then thyself.’ And the answer fell Fierce as a blast of hate from hell,
‘No man of mine that with me dwell
    Shall strike at thee but I their lord,
For love of this my brother slain.’
And Pellam caught & grasped amain
A grim great weapon, fierce & fain
    To feed his hungering sword.

1766 ‘No man of mine <^…^> that with my dwell MS
1767 Shall <…> <^fight^> ^strike at thee^ <with thou his hand^ but I <the king> ^their lord^, MS
1771 <…Sir Balen did> To feed his hungering sword. MS
And eagerly he smote, & sped
Not well: for Balen’s blade, yet red
With lifeblood of the murderous dead,
Between the swordstroke & his head
    Shone, & the strength of the eager stroke
Shore it in sunder: then the knight,
Naked & weaponless for fight,
Ran seeking him a sword to smite
    As hope within him woke.
And so their flight for deathward fast
From chamber forth to chamber past
Where lay no weapon, till the last
Whose doors made way for Balen cast
   Upon him as a sudden spell
Wonder that even as lightning leapt
Across his heart & eyes, & swept
As storm across his soul that kept
   Wild watch, & watched not well.

1784  From chamber forth to chamber [passed]  C&W 1896
1785  <And> Where lay no weapon, till the last  MS
For there the deed he did, being near
Death’s danger, breathless as the deer
Driven hard to bay, but void of fear,
Brought sorrow down for many a year
   On many a man in many a land.
All glorious shone that chamber, bright
As burns at sunrise heaven’s own height:
With cloth of gold the bed was dight,
   That flamed on either hand.
And one he saw within it lie:
A table of all clean gold thereby
Stood stately, fair as morning’s eye,
With four strong silver pillars, high
   And firm as faith & hope may be:
And on it shone the gift he sought,
A spear most marvelously wrought,
That when his eye & handgrip caught
   Small fear at heart had he.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Line</th>
<th>Original Text</th>
<th>Variants</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1804</td>
<td>A table of ^all^ clean gold thereby</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1804</td>
<td>A table of all [clear] gold thereby</td>
<td>C&amp;W 1896</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1805</td>
<td>Stood stately, ^lifted up^ ^steadfast hold^ ^on high^ fair as morning’s eye,</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1808</td>
<td>And on it ^lay^ ^shone^ the ^…^ ^stay^ ^gift^ he sought,</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Right on King Pellam then, as fire
Turns when the thwarting winds wax higher,
He turned, & smote him down. So dire

The stroke was, when his heart’s desire
Struck, & had all its fill of hate,
That as the king fell swooning down
Fell the walls, rent from base to crown,
Prone as prone seas that break & drown

  Ships fraught with doom for freight.

1815 He turned, & smote him down<s>. So dire  MS
1820 Prone as <the> ^prone^ seas that break & drown  MS
1821 <The> Ships fraught with doom for freight.  MS
And there for three days’ silent space
Balenn & Pellam face to face
Lay dead or deathlike, & the place
Was death’s blind kingdom, till the grace
That God had given the sacred seer
For counsel or for comfort led
His Merlin thither, & he said,
Standing between the quick & dead,
‘Rise up, & rest not here.’
And Balen rose & set his eyes
Against the seer’s, as one that tries
His heart against the sea’s & sky’s
And fears not if he lives or dies,
   Saying, ‘I would have my damosel,
Ere I fare forth, to fare with me’.
And sadly Merlin answered, ‘See Where now she lies; death knows if she Shall now fare ill or well.’
‘And in this world we meet no more,
Balen.’ And Balen, sorrowing sore,
Though fearless yet the heart he bore
Beat toward the life that lay before,
Rode forth through many a wild waste land
Where men cried out against him, mad
With grievous faith in fear that bade
Their wrath make moan for doubt they had
Lest hell had armed his hand.
For in that chamber’s wondrous shrine
Was part of Christ’s own blood, the wine
Shed of the true triumphal vine
Whose growth bids earth’s deep darkness shine
    As heaven’s deep light through the air & sea;
That mystery toward our northern shore
Arimathaean Joseph bore
For healing of our sins of yore,
    That grace even there might be.

And with that spear there shrined apart
Was Christ’s side smitten to the heart.
And fierier than the lightning’s dart
The stroke was, & the deathlike smart
     Wherewith, nigh drained of blood & breath,
The king lay stricken as one long dead:
And Joseph’s was the blood there shed,
For near akin was he that bled,
     Near even as life to death.

1865 And [fiercer] than the lightning dart  C&W 1896
1867 Wherewith, <the king> nigh drained of blood & breath,  MS
And therefore fell on all that land
Sorrow: for still on either hand
As Balen rode alone & scanned
Bright fields & cities built to stand
    Till time should break them, dead men lay;
And loud & long, from all their folk
Living, one cry that cursed him broke;
Three countries had his dolorous stroke
    Slain, or should surely slay.

1874  Sorrow: for still on either hand[,]  C&W 1896
1877  Till time should break them, ^dead^ men lay; <dead,>  MS
1878  And loud [and] long [<,>] from all their folk  C&W 1896
1880  ^Three countries had his^ <Who had slain them by the> dolorous stroke  MS
1882  <…>  MS
VII.

1

In winter, when the year burns low
As fire wherein no firebrands glow,
And winds dishevel as they blow
The lovely stormy wings of snow,
   The hearts of northern men burn bright
With joy that mocks the joy of spring
To hear all heaven’s keen clarions ring
Music that bids the spirit sing
   And day give thanks for night.

1883 [VII] C&W 1896
1884 [<>] C&W 1896
1885 In winter, when the world ^year^ burns low MS
1885 [IN] winter, when the years burns low C&W 1896
2
Aloud & dark as hell or hate
Round Balen’s head the wind of fate
Blew storm & cloud from death’s wide gate:
But joy as grief in him was great
To face God’s doom & live or die,
Sorrowing for ill wrought unaware,
Rejoicing in desire to dare
All ill that innocence might bear
With changeless heart & eye.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Line</th>
<th>Text</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1895</td>
<td>Aloud &amp; dark as <code>&lt;death&gt;</code> <code>&lt;^fear^&gt;</code> <code>&lt;^hell^&gt;</code> or hate</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1899</td>
<td>To face God’s <code>&lt;will&gt;</code> <code>&lt;^doom^&gt;</code> &amp; live or die,</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1900</td>
<td>Sorrowing for <code>&lt;wrong done&gt;</code> <code>&lt;^ill wrought^&gt;</code> unaware,</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1901</td>
<td>Rejoicing in <code>&lt;delight&gt;</code> <code>&lt;^desire^&gt;</code> to dare</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1902</td>
<td>All <code>&lt;do...&gt;</code> ill that innocence might bear</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Yet passing fain he was when past
Those lands & woes at length & last.
Eight times, as thence he fared forth fast,
Dawn rose & even was overcast
   With starry darkness dear as day,
Before his venturous quest might meet
Adventure, seeing within a sweet
Green low-lying forest, hushed in heat,
   A tower that barred his way.

1907  <And eight> ^Eight^ times, as thence he fared forth fast,   MS
1909  With starry darkness <sweet> ^dear^ as day,           MS
4

Strong summer, dumb with rapture, bound
With golden calm the woodlands round
Wherethrough the knight forth faring found
A knight that on the greenwood ground
Sat mourning: fair he was to see,
And moulded as for love or fight
A maiden’s dreams might frame her knight;
But sad in joy’s far-flowering sight
As grief’s blind thrall might be.
‘God save you,’ Balen softly said,
‘What grief bows down your heart & head
Thus, as one sorrowing for his dead?
Tell me, if haply I may stead
   In aught your sorrow, that I may’.
‘Sir knight,’ that other said, ‘thy word
Makes my grief heavier that I heard’.
And pity & wonder inly stirred
   Drew Balen thence away.
And so withdrawn with silent speed
He saw the sad knight’s stately steed,
A war-horse meet for warrior’s need,
That none who passed might choose but heed,

So strong he stood, so great, so fair,
With eyes afire for flight or fight,
A joy to look on, mild in might,
And swift & keen & kind as light,
And all as clear of care.

1935  And so withdrawn with <soft> ^silent^ speed
1938  <Made past to a tree> ^That none who passed^ might choose but heed,

MS
MS
And Balen, gazing on him, heard
Again his master’s woful word
Sound sorrow through the calm unstirred
By fluttering wind or flickering bird,
    Thus: ‘Ah, fair lady & faithless, why
Break thy pledged faith to meet me? soon
An hour beyond thy trothplight noon
Shall strike my death-bell, & thy boon
    Is this, that here I die.
8

‘My curse for all thy gifts may be Heavier than death or night on thee:
For now this sword thou gavest me
Shall set me from thy bondage free.’

And there the man had died self-slain,
But Balen leapt on him & caught
The blind fierce hand that fain had wrought
Self-murder, stung with fire of thought,
As rage makes anguish fain.

1955

1956 Heavier than death or night on thee[;] C&W 1896
Then, mad for thwarted grief, ‘Let go
My hand’, the fool of wrath & woe
Cried, ‘or I slay thee.’ Scarce the glow
In Balen’s cheek & eye might show,
   As dawn shows day while seas lie chill,
He heard, tho pity took not heed,
But smiled & spake, ‘That shall not need:
What man may do to bid you speed
   I, so God speed me, will.’

1966  My hand[,] the fool of wrath & woe  C&W 1896
1969  <Made answer,> <As dawn shows day ere heaven>
   ^As dawn shows day while seas lie chill,^  MS
1970  He heard, <&> ^tho pity^ took not heed,  MS
1970  He heard, [though] pity took not heed,  C&W  1896
1972  What man may do <by mede or deed> to bid you speed  MS
1973  <To help you> <I> I, so God speed me, will.’  MS
And the other craved his name, beguiled
By hope that made his madness mild.
Again Sir Balen spake & smiled:
‘My name is Balen, called the Wild
    By knights whom kings & courts make tame
Because I ride alone afar
And follow but my soul for star.’
‘Ah, sir, I know the knight you are,
    And all your fiery fame.'
The knight that bears two swords I know,
Most praised of all men, friend & foe,
For prowess of your hands, that show
Dark war the way where balefires glow
    And kindle glory like the dawn’s.’
So spake the sorrowing knight, & stood
As one whose heart fresh hope made good:
And forth they rode by wold & wood
    And down the glimmering lawns.

1988  Dark war the way <…> where balefires glow  MS
And Balen craved his name who rode
Beside him, where the wild wood glowed
With joy to feel how noontide flowed
Through glade & glen & rough green road
Till earth grew joyful as the sea.

‘My name is Garnyshe of the Mount,
A poor man’s son of none account,’
He said, ‘where springs of loftier fount
Laugh loud with pride to be.'
‘But strength in weakness lives & stands
As rocks that rise through shifting sands;
And for the prowess of my hands
One made me knight & gave me lands,
Duke Hermel, lord from far to near,
Our prince: & she that loved me – she
I love, & deemed she loved but me,
His daughter, pledged her faith to be
Ere now beside me here’.
And Balen, brief of speech as light
Whose word, beheld of depth & height,
Strikes silence through the stars of night,
Spake, & his face as dawn’s grew bright,
    For hope to help a happier man,
‘How far then lies she hence?’ ‘By this,:
Her lover signed & said, ‘I wis,
Not six fleet miles the passage is,
    And straight as thought could span’.

2016 Whose word, beheld <up> ^of^ depth & height,
                    MS
2020 ‘How far then lies she <hence & from> <now?>’ By this,
    ^hence?’ ‘By this,’
                    MS
2021 <The> ^Her^ lover *<…>^ sighed & said, ‘I wis,
2023 <That severs her from me, I wis.>
    ^And straight as thought could span’.
2023 And straight as thought could span[.]
                    C&W 1896
15
So rode they swift & sure, & found
A castle walled & dyked around:
And Balen, as a warrior bound
On search where hope might fear to sound,
      The darkness of the deeps of doubt,
Made entrance through the guardless gate
As life, while hope in life grows great,
Makes way between the doors of fate
      That death may pass thereout.
Through many a glorious chamber, wrought
For all delight that love’s own thought
Might dream or dwell in, Balen sought
And found of all he looked for nought,
   For like a shining shell her bed
Shone void & vacant of her: thence
Through devious wonders bright & dense
He passed & saw with shame-struck sense
   Where shame & faith lay dead.

2041 <Down <~Passing~> in a fa... strait garden’s pen>
   ~Through devious wonders bright & dense           MS
2042 He <saw> passed & saw <with> <~what~> ^with^ shame <...> ~-struck~ sense                MS
2043 <To see> Where shame & faith lay dead.        MS
Down in a sweet small garden, fair
With flowerful joy in the ardent air,
He saw, & raged with loathing, where
She lay with love-dishevelled hair
   Beneath a broad bright laurel tree
And clasped in amorous arms a knight,
The unloveliest that his scornful sight
Had dwelt on yet; a shame the bright
   Broad noon might shrink to see.

2052 Had dwelt on <…> ^yet^; a <sight> ^shame^ the bright
And thence in wrathful hope he turned,
Hot as the heart within him burned,
To meet the knight whose love, so spurned
And spat on & made nought of; yearned
And dreamed & hoped & lived in vain,
And said, ‘I have found her sleeping fast,’
And led him where the shadows cast
From leaves wherethrough light winds ran past
Screened her from sun & rain.
But Garnysshe, seeing, reeled as he stood
Like a tree, kingliest of the wood,
Half hewn through: & the burning blood
Through lips & nostrils burst aflood:
   And gathering back his rage & might
As broken breakers rally & roar
The loud wind down that drives off shore,
He smote their heads off; there no more
   Their life might shame the light.

2068 Through lips & nostrils burst <…> aflood: MS
2070 As <waves wind> ^gate^ broken breakers rally & roar MS
2072 He smote their heads off[;] there no more C&W 1896
Then turned he back toward Balen, mad
With grief, & said, ‘The grief I had
Was nought: ere this my life was glad:
Thou hast done this deed: I was but sad
   And fearful how my hope might fare:
I had lived my sorrow down, hadst thou
Not shown me what I saw but now.’
The sorrow & scorn on Balen’s brow
   Bade silence curb him there.
And Balen answered: ‘What I did I did to hearten thee & bid
Thy courage know that shame should rid
A man’s high heart of love that hid

Blind shame within its core: God knows,
I did, to set a bondman free,
But as I would thou hadst done by me,
That seeing what love must die to see

Love’s end might well be woe’s.’

But as I would you did to ^thou hadst done by^ me,
Love’s death ring ^end^ might bring forth
chime with^ ^will be^ woe’s.’
‘Alas,’ the woful weakling said,
‘I have slain what most I loved: I have shed
The blood most near my heart: the head
Lies cold as earth, defiled & dead,
    That all my life was lighted by,
That all my soul bowed down before,
And now may bear with life no more:
For now my sorrow that I bore
    Is twofold, & I die.’

2096  <Whose violent hand two deaths made red>
    ^\textit{I have slain what most I loved: \textit{the heart}}>
    ^\textit{I have shed}^^  MS
2101  And now may bear with life \textit{\ldots} no more:  MS
Then with his red wet sword he rove

His breast in sunder, where it clove

Life, & no pulse against it strove,

So sure & strong the deep stroke drove

Deathward: & Balen, seeing him dead,

Rode thence, lest folk would say he had slain

Those three: & ere three days again

Had seen the sun’s might wax & wane

Far forth he had spurred & sped.

---

2110 Rode thence, that none might ^lest folk would^ say he had slain

2111 Those three[; and] ere three days again

2112 Had seen the sun’s might wax & wane[.]

2113 Far forth <\. … > ^he^ had <…sped> <^spurred^>

^spurred & sped.^
And riding past a cross whereon
Broad golden letters written shone,
Saying, ‘No knight born may ride alone
Forth toward this castle’, & all the stone
    Glowed in the sun’s glare even as though
Blood stained it from the crucified
Dead burden of one that there had died,
An old hoar man he saw beside
    Whose face was wan as woe.

2115 And riding <toward> ^past^ a cross whereon         MS
2117 <Showing how no knight might>
    ^Saying, ‘No knight born may^ ride alone         MS
2118 ^Forth^ <toward this <near> castle’, & all the stone    MS
2118 Forth toward this castle[,’ and] all the stone     C&W 1896
2120 Blood stained it from <one> ^the^ crucified        MS
‘Balen the Wild,’ he said, ‘this way
Thy way lies not: thou hast passed today
Thy bands: but turn again, & stay
Thy passage, while thy soul hath sway
    Within thee, & through God’s good power
It will avail thee:’ & anon
His likeness as a cloud was gone,
And Balen’s heart within him shone
    Clear as the cloudless hour.
Nor fate nor fear might overcast
The soul now near its peace at last.
Suddenly, thence as forth he past,
A mighty & a deadly blast
    Blown of a hunting-horn he heard,
As when the chase hath nobly sped.
‘That blast is blown for me’, he said,
‘The prize am I who am yet not dead’,
    And smiled upon the word.
27
As toward a royal hart’s death rang
That note, whence all the loud wood sang
With winged & living sound that sprang
Like fire, & keen as fire’s own fang
   Pierced the sweet silence that it slew.
But nought like death or strife was here:
Fair semblance & most goodly cheer
They made him, they whose troop drew near
   As death among them drew.

2145  As toward a royal <…> hart’s death rang  MS
2150  But nought <of sorrow> ^like death^ or strife
       <seemed near> ^was here:^     MS
2152  They made him, <while their> ^they whose^ troop drew near                  MS
A hundred ladies well arrayed
And many a knight well weaponed made
That kindly show of cheer: the glade
Shone round them till its very shade
Lightened & laughed from grove to lawn
To hear & see them: so they brought
Within a castle fair as thought
Could dream that wizard hands had wrought
The guest among them drawn.

2157  <Such>  ^That^ kindly show of cheer: the glade  MS
2159  Lightened & laughed <as>  ^from^ grove to lawn  MS
2162  Could dream that wizard hands had <drawn>  ^wrought^  MS
29
All manner of glorious joy was there:
Harping & dancing, loud & fair,
And minstrelsy that made of air
Fire, so like fire its raptures were.

Then the chief lady spake on high:
‘Knight with the two swords, one of two
Must help you here or fall from you:
For needs you now must have ado
And joust with one hereby.

2165

2170

2171  Must help you <now> ^here^ or fall from you:  MS
A good knight guards an island here
Against all swords that chance brings near,
And there with stroke of sword & spear
Must all for whom these halls make cheer
    Fight, & redeem or yield up life.’
‘An evil custom,’ Balen said,
‘Is this, that none whom chance hath led
Hither, if knighthood crown his head,
    May pass unstirred to strife.’

2176  <An island> ^Against^ all swords that chance <draws>
      ^brings^ near,          MS
2179  Fight, & redeem or <leave his> ^yield up^ life.’          MS
2183  May pass un<touched of>^stirred to^ strife.’          MS
‘You shall not have ado to fight
Here save against one only knight,‘
She said, & all her face grew bright
As hell-fire, lit with hungry light
    That wicked laughter touched with flame.
‘Well, since I shall thereto,’ said he,
‘I am ready at heart as death for me:
Fain would I be where death should be
    And life should lose its name.

2191  ‘I am ready at heart <as man may be> ^as death for me^:    MS
‘But traveling men whose goal afar
Shines as a cloud-constraining star
Are often weary, & wearier are
Their steeds that feel each fret & jar
   Wherewith the wild ways wound them: yet,
Albeit my horse be weary, still
My heart is nowise weary; will
Sustains it even till death fulfil
   My trust upon him set.’

2195 ‘But traveling men whose goal\textless s\textgreater \quad \textless \ldots \textgreater \text{afar} \quad \text{MS}
2196 Shines as \textless the un...\textgreater
   a cloud-\textless \ldots \textgreater\textasciitilde surpass\textasciitilde constrain\textasciitilde ing star \quad \text{MS}
2197 \textless \ldots \textgreater \text{Are often weary, & wearier are} \quad \text{MS}
2198 Their steeds that feel \textless the wild ways\textgreater\textasciitilde each fret &\textasciitilde jar \quad \text{MS}
'Sir,' said a knight thereby that stood,
Meseems your shield is now not good
But worn with warrior work, nor could Sustain in strife the strokes it would:
   A larger will I lend you.' 'Ay,
Thereof I thank you', Balen said,
Being single of heart as one that read
No face aright whence faith had fled,
   Nor dreamed that faith could fly.
And so he took that shield unknown
And left for treason’s touch his own,
And toward that island rode alone
Nor heard the blast against him blown
   Sound in the wind’s & water’s sound,
But hearkening toward the stream’s edge heard
Nought save the soft stream’s rippling word,
   Glad with the gladness of a bird,
   That sang to the air around.

2217 And toward that island rode alone[,]  C&W 1896
2218 Nor heard the blast <his doom> against him blown  MS
2221 <Avo…”> Nought save the soft stream’s rippling word,  MS
And there against the water-side
He saw, fast moored to rock & ride,
A fair great boat anear abide
Like one that waits the turning tide,
    Wherein embarked his horse & he
Passed over toward no kindly strand:
And where they stood again on land
There stood a maiden hard at hand
    Who seeing them wept to see.

2231  And <as> ^where^ they stood again on land  MS
And ‘O knight Balen’, was her cry,
‘Why have ye left your own shield? why
Come hither out of time to die?
For had ye kept your shield, thereby
    Ye had yet been know, & died not here.
Great pity it is of you this day
As ever was of knight, or may
Be ever, seeing in war’s bright way
    Praise knows not Balen’s peer.’
And Balen said, ‘Thou hast heard my name
Right: it repenteth me, though shame
May tax me not with base men’s blame,
That ever, hap what will, I came
    Within this country; yet, being come,
For shame I may not turn again
Now, that myself & nobler men
May scorn me: now is more than then,
    And faith bids fear be dumb.

2245

2250

2253  And faith bids fear be dumb.<’>  MS
38

‘Be it life or death, my chance I take,
Be it life’s to build or death’s to break:
And fall what may, me lists not make
Moan for sad life’s or death’s sad sake.’

Then looked he on his armour, glad
And high of heart, & found it strong:
And all his soul became a song
And soared in prayer that soared not long,
   For all the hope it had.

2255

2260

2256 <As chance for time’s adventurous sake>
   ^Be it life’s to build or deaths’ to break:^  MS
Then saw he whence against him came
A steed whose trappings shone life flame,
And he that rode him showed the same
Fierce colour, bright as fire or fame,
    But dark the visors were as night
That hid from Balen Balan’s face,
And his from Balan: God’s own grace
Forsook them for a shadowy space
    Where darkness cast out light.

2267  And he that rode him <bore> ^showed^ the same  MS
2270  <And> That hid from Balen Balan’s face,  MS
The two swords girt that Balen bare
Gave Balan for a breath’s while there
Pause, wondering if indeed it were
Balen his brother, bound to dare
    The chance of that unhappy quest:
But seeing not as he thought to see
His shield, he deemed it was not he.
And so, as fate bade sorrow be,
    They laid their spears in rest.
So mighty was the course they ran
With spear to spear so great of span,
Each fell back stricken, man by man,
Horse by horse, borne down: so the ban
    That wrought by doom against them wrought:
But Balen by his falling steed
Was bruised the sorer, being indeed
Way-weary, like a rain-bruised reed,
    With travel ere he fought.

2285 With spear to spear <to> so great of span  MS
2289 That wrought <for> ^by^ doom against them wrought: MS
2291 Was bruised <sore as> ^the sorer, being indeed^ MS
2292 <Being> ^Way-^weary, like a rain-bruised reed, MS
And Balen rose again from swoon
First, & went toward him: all too soon
He too then rose, & the evil boon
Of strength came back, & the evil tune
   Of battle unnatural made again
Mad music as for death’s wide ear
Listening & hungering toward the near
Last sigh that life or death might hear
   As last from dying men.

2295

2297 He too then rose, & the evil \textit{tune} boon \hfill MS
2298 Of strength \textit{life} came back, & the evil tune \hfill MS
2301 Listening & hungering \textit{for} \textit{toward} the near \hfill MS
Balan smote Balen first, & clove
His lifted shield that rose & strove
In vain against the stroke that drove Down: as the web that morning wove
   Of glimmering pearl from spray to spray
Dies when the strong sun strikes it, so
Shrank the steel, tempered thrice to show
Strength, as the mad might of the blow
   Shore Balen’s helm away.

2311  <Beneath the mad might of the blow>
   ^Shrank the steel, tempered thrice to show^  MS
Then turning as a turning wave
Against the land-wind, blind and brave
With hope that dreams despair may save,
With even the unhappy sword that gave
The gifts of fame & fate in one
He smote his brother, & there had nigh
Felled him: & while they breathed, his eye
Glanced up, & saw beneath the sky
Sights fairer than the sun.

2317  With hope that <calls> ^dreams^ despair <to> ^may^ save,       MS
2317  [In] hope that dreams despair may save,                  C&W 1896
2320  He smote his brother, & ^there^ had nigh              MS
The towers of all the castle there
Stood full of ladies, blithe & fair
As the earth beneath & the amorous air
About them & above them were:
    So toward the blind & fateful fight
Again those brethren went, & sore
Were all the strokes they smote & bore,
    And breathed again, & fell once more
    To battle in their sight.

As the earth beneath ^or^ the amorous air
Were all the strokes they ^smote^ & bore,
46
With blood that either spilt & bled
Was all the ground they fought on red,
And each knight’s hauberik hewn & shred
Left each unmailed & naked, shed
    From off them even as mantles cast:
And oft they breathed, & drew but breath
Brief as the word strong sorrow saith,
And poured & drank the draught of death,
    Till fate was full at last.

2335 With blood that either spilt & <shed> ~bled~
2339 From off them even as mantles <torn> cast:
       MS
And Balan, younger born than he
Whom darkness bade him slay, & be Slain, as in mist where none may see
If aught abide or fall or flee,
   Draw back a little & laid him down,
Dying: but Balen stood, & said,
As one between the quick & dead
Might stand & speak, ‘What good knight’s head
   Hath won this mortal crown?’
‘What knight art thou? for never I
Who now beside thee dead shall die
Found yet the knight afar or nigh
That matched me’. Then his brother’s eye
   Flashed pride & love; he spake & smiled
And felt in death life’s quickening flame,
And answered: ‘Balan is my name,
The good knight Balen’s brother: fame
   Calls & miscalls him wild.’

<As one assured of life & As though death felt life’s quickening>
^And felt in death life’s quickening flame.^
The cry from Balen’s lips that sprang
Sprang sharper than his sword’s stroke rang.
More keen than death’s or memory’s fang,
Through sense & soul the shuddering pang
Shivered: & scarce he had cried, ‘Alas
That ever I should see this day;’
When sorrow swooned from him away
As blindly back he fell, & lay
Where sleep lets anguish pass.
But Balan rose on hands & knees
And crawled by childlike dim degrees
Up toward his brother, as a breeze
Creeps wingless over sluggard seas
   When all the wind’s heart fails it: so
Beneath their mother’s eyes had he,
A babe that laughed with joy to be,
Made toward him standing by her knee
   For love’s sake long ago.

2376  And crawled by <death delayed> <^childlike^> ^childlike^<^...^> degrees  MS
Then, gathering strength up for a space,
From off his brother’s dying face
With dying hands that wrought apace
While death & life would grant them grace
He loosed his helm & knew not him,
So scored with blood it was, & hewn
Athwart with darkening wounds: but soon
Life strove & shuddered through the swoon
Wherein its light lay dim.
And sorrow set these chained words free:

'O Balan, O my brother! me
Thou hast slain, & I, my brother, thee:
And now far hence, on shore & sea,
    Shall all the wide world speak of us.'

'Alas', said Balan, 'that I might
Not know you, seeing two swords were dight
About you; now the unanswering sight
    Hath here found answer thus.

2397  Thou hast slain, & I, my ^thy^ brother, thee:  MS
2398  And now ^by land & shore^ ^far hence, on shore,&
2400  Alas[,] said Balan, ^that I might C&W 1896
2402  About you; ^yet^ ^now^ the unanswering sight MS
2403  ^Availed me not but^ ^Hath here found answer^ thus. MS
‘Because you bore another shield
Then yours, that even ere youth could wield
Like arms with manhood’s tried & steeled,
Shone as my star of battle-field,
    I deemed it surely might not be
My brother’. Then his brother spake
Fiercely: ‘Would God, for thy sole sake,
I had my life again, to take
    Revenge for only thee!’

2405 ‘Because you <ha…> bore another shield
2406 Than yours, that <was,> <^still^> <while> ^even ere^ youth <would wield> ^could wield^ MS
2407 <Proud hope its fault trust in things unsealed,>
    ^Like arms with manhood’s^ <^hope days fast^>
    ^tried & sealed,^ MS
2413 Revenge for ^only^ thee <& me>! MS
‘For all this deadly work was wrought
Of one false knight’s false word & thought,
Whose mortal craft & counsel caught
And snared my faith who doubted nought,
    And made me put my shield away.
Ah, might I live, I would destroy
That castle for its customs: joy
There makes of grief a deadly toy,
    And death makes night of day.’
‘Well done were that, if aught were done
Well ever here beneath the sun,’
Said Balan: ‘better work were none:
For hither since I came & won
    A woful honour born of death,
When here my hap it was to slay
    A knight who kept this island way,
I might not pass by night or day
    Hence, as this token saith.

2426  Well <…> ever here beneath the sun,’  MS
'No more shouldst thou, for all the might
Of heart & hand that seals thee knight
Most noble of all that see the light,
Brother, hadst thou but slain in fight
    Me, & arisen unscathed & whole,
As would to God thou hadst risen! though here
Light is as darkness, hope as fear,
And love as hate: & none draws near
    Save toward a mortal goal.'
Then, fair as any poison-flower
Whose blossom blights the withering bower
Whereon its blasting breath has power,
Forth fared the lady of the tower
   With many a lady & many a knight,
And came across the water-way
Even where on death’s dim border lay
Those brethren sent of her to slay
   And die in kindless fight.
And all those hard light hearts were swayed
With pity passing like a shade
That stays not, & may be not stayed,
To hear the mutual moan they made,
    Each to behold his brother die,
Saying, 'Both we came out of one tomb,
One star-crossed mother’s woful womb,
And so within one grave-pit’s gloom
    Untimely shall we lie.'
And Balan prayed, as God should bless
That lady for her gentleness,
That where the battle’s mortal stress
Had made for them perforce to press
   The bed whence never man may rise
They twain, free now from hopes & fears,
Might sleep; & she, as one that hears,
Bowed her bright head: & very tears
   Fell from her cold fierce eyes.

2468  Had made <perforce for them> ^for them perforce^ to press
2473  <Shone in> Fell from her cold fierce eyes.
Then Balan prayed her send a priest
To housel them, that ere they ceased
The hansel of the heavenly feast
That fills with light from the answering east
   The sunset of the life of man
Might bless them, & their lips be kissed
With death’s requickening eucharist,
And death’s & life’s dim sunlit mist
   Pass as a stream that ran.
And so their dying rites were done:
And Balen, seeing the death-struck sun
Sink, spake as he whose goal is won:
‘Now, when our trophied tomb is one,
    And over us our tale is writ,
How two that loved each other, two
Born & begotten brethren, slew
Each other, none that reads anew
    Shall choose but weep for it.

2487  Sink, spake as he whose goal is <one> ^won^:
2491  Born ^& begotten^ brethren <of one mother>, slew
And no good knight & no good man
Whose eye shall ever come to scan
This record of the imperious ban
That made our life so sad a span
    Shall read or hear, who shall not pray
For us for ever’. Then anon
Died Balan; but the sun was gone,
And deep the stars of midnight shone,
    Ere Balen passed away.

2497  This record <that records the> ^of the imperious^ ban  MS
2499  Shall read or hear, <&> ^who^ shall not pray  MS
And there low lying, as hour on hour
Fled, all his life in all its flower
Came back as in a sunlit shower
Of dreams, when sweet-souled sleep has power
    On life less sweet & glad to be.
He drank the draught of life’s first wine
Again: he saw the moorland shine,
The rioting rapids of the Tyne,
    The woods, the cliffs, the sea.
The joy that lives at heart & home,
The joy to rest, the joy to roam,
The joy of crags & scaurs he clomb,
The rapture of the encountering foam
   Embraced & breasted of the boy,
The first good steed his knees bestrode,
The first wild sound of songs that flowed
Through ears that thrilled & heart that glowed,
   Fulfilled his death with joy.

2517  The joy of <waves that curl & comb>
   ^crags & scaurs he clomb^,
2522  Through ears that thrilled <…> & heart that glowed,  MS

293
65
So, dying not as a coward that dies
And dares not look in death’s dim eyes
Straight as the stars on seas & skies
Whence moon & sun recoil & rise,
    He looked on life & death, & slept.
And there with morning Merlin came,
And on the tomb that told their fame
He wrote by Balan’s Balen’s name,
    And gazed thereon, & wept.
For all his heart within him yearned
With pity like as fire that burned.
The fate his fateful eye discerned
Far off now dimmed it, ere he turned
   His face toward Camelot, to tell
Arthur of all the storms that woke
Round Balen, & the dolorous stroke,
And how that last blind battle broke
   The consummated spell.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Line</th>
<th>Text</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2536</td>
<td>With pity like as fire that ^that^ burned.</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2537</td>
<td>That night should reap what light had earned ^The fate his ^fateful^ eye from far discerned^</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2540</td>
<td>Arthur of all the &lt;…&gt; ^grief^ ^storms^ that ^broke^ ^woke^</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2541</td>
<td>On ^For^ ^Round^ Balen, &amp; the dolorous stroke,</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2542</td>
<td>And how that last ^blind^ battle broke</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2543</td>
<td>The consummated ^Life’s bond &amp; sorrow’s^ spell.</td>
<td>MS</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
‘Alas,’ King Arthur said, ‘this day
I have heard the worst that woe might say:
For in this world that wanes away
I know not two such knights as they.’

This is the tale that memory writes
Of men whose names like stars shall stand,
Balen & Balan, sure of hand,
Two brethren of Northumberland,
In life & death good knights.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Harrison, Antony. “‘For Love of This My Brother’: Medievalism and Tragedy in Swinburne’s The Tale of Balen.”  Texas Studies in Literature and Language 25:3 (Fall 1983), 470-494.

VITA

Warren Hill Kelly

Education

Ph.D., English, The University of Mississippi
M.A., English, The University of Toronto
B.A., English, summa cum laude, Vanderbilt University

Employment

Instructor of English (full-time), Florida Atlantic University, Boca Raton, 2009-current Instructor of English (12th grade British lit.), Saint Andrew’s School, Boca Raton, Florida, 2005-2009
Graduate Instructor of English, The University of Mississippi, Oxford, 2000-2005

Honors

Phi Kappa Phi, The University of Mississippi, 2003
Phi Beta Kappa, Junior-year election, Vanderbilt University, 1998

Publications

Professional Development

The School for Criticism and Theory, Cornell University, Summer 2007