It should be borne in mind that statute law is a small part of our law; that courts interpret statutes strictly; that any exception to the common law remains an exception even when the common law has become statute law, unless the statute specifically and directly states that it covers also that which before had been the exception.

Since in a number of states having statutes similar to the statute of Illinois the courts have held that in corporations formed to work a wasting asset depletion need not be considered in declaring dividends, it is only reasonable to believe that when this question comes up in the Illinois courts it will be decided upon the same principles of common law as in the other states. Without a doubt the Illinois courts will follow the precedents established in the decisions quoted herein. Mr. Floyd entirely underestimates the importance of the common law and overrates the statute law if he believes differently.

Yous truly,

Urbana, Illinois, April 2, 1923.
